Fortune's Apprentice

BY Leonard Leslie

"True—except that a doctor is one of those rare individuals who thinks more of helping his fellows than of making his fortune. That should be his ideal, and often is. Him! That sounds a little pious, but I hope it is true."

"You're an idealist all right, Edward. What is so prevent me having a similar notion of service?"

"Nothing, so far as I know."

"Men don't appreciate how women have been changing. They think our usefulness ends in being decorative and entertaining or soothing. Even your sister is kept in a glass case in spite of having an engaged father and a brother, who has had the courage to pursue his own bent."

"Are you an exception to the general rule? Do most women think the same? Does Patricia?" Edward asked the question wonderingly.

"She would be an exception in spite of being a doctor you haven't yet got an understanding of the general rule—look of people and especially of women. I've known a doctor who that a person like me, comfortably off, should hanker after a harder life."

"You didn't answer my question about Pat?" he remarked, avoiding her own inquiry.

"I did not. Patricia will probably fill a niche in society and settle down cozily. Why not?"

"You're right. After all you're said, I imagine she too, may have ideas."

But if Patricia knew Pat's mind, she would be disappointed in it, and the talk continued on more general lines until Edward admitted she had given him a lot to think about. And Edward thought of the course he and even more about Patricia who obviously had far more intelligence and practical common sense than he had supposed.

Perhaps there had been too much youthful arrogance in his motto of the travel the widest way to travel alone. "Such a girl as Patricia would be an asset. She would not hold him back, and he would not have to do this, that, and the other."

Strange, that one of the exclusive Sandlers should strike him as the first desirable bridegroom with whom he had come into contact. No, he must not say "helpmate." Patricia would withdraw the honor. Colonel Partner. He liked the last best of all. Yes, Patricia would make a grand partner.

Long ago he had decided he liked her very much for herself. John Morris had actually twitted him with being a "smitten" whatever that might signify.

Was he falling in love with Patricia in the age-old manner? He could not tell. He had not decided. During his stay in the vicinity he took to calling more often at the Grange. Such visits were encouraged by the Admiral and the Sturtons might have peculiar notions, but they were worthy and stood in the way of one day Edward would inherit the estates. Quite a good match, in fact, if there were anything in it, and John Sandley felt sure she was mistaken. The usual signs were there.

Before finishing his holiday, Edward proposed. Nobody was more surprised than himself. A fortnight previously he had not dreamed of doing any such thing. He had always been conscious of her attractions, and lately she had seemed to catch his eye. He had told himself, it was the reverse of her active mind and her progressive outlook that drew him, even more than her physical charms and her sympathetic nature.

Phillips accepted. "Providing" she could be permitted to marry him, really to be the wife of a house doctor or not, merely the mistress of his house would want it that way, my dear."

"You don't think, do you, that I am deceiving as a means of escape from my present environment?"

"Certainly not. And not because you are such a thing. He had already been the wife of a house doctor, and French and German—not in fact, for any utilitarian reason whatever. And he kissed her eagerly to show that in essence, this mating had the same foundation as any other."

"When a woman finds out what she wants she never mind, let us take it as read."

UNSENTIMENTAL EDWARD

Their wooing lacked some of the sentimental trimmings common to the young of that generation—mutual trust and appreciation—almost a dispassionate consideration for compatibility of temperament. All these were in the foreground.

Everyone was delighted on the face of it, this was a romance beyond of any tiresome complications. Two well-connected young people, each with a well-defined social sphere, were to marry; that was very much as chiefly concerned were unaffected by these factors. What few doubts there were stirred only in the mind of Admiral Sandley, who thought the occasion almost ripe to warn Edward away from that confounded "hobby" creating Edward's devotion to a medical career.

"Sheer waste of energy," he remarked to Mrs. Sandley. "Edward should be familiarizing himself with the duties of a landowner."

"You had no financial need to enter the Navy," she reminded him.

"That and have a special offering in the service of the country..."

"Yes, dear?"

"I try you do not question my motives?"

"Why, of course not, though there were your family estates, you know."

"Ahem! Well, looked after, my dear. And my training in the Service was by no means incompatible with handling subordinates left in charge."

"But Sir Charles has brought you home to do that work for his family," she said.

"Pah! Morris, indeed! I am thinking of Edward. The boy does not appear to appreciate the fact that he is heir to a considerable property, and all his responsibilities attendant on it. Never takes the same interest I do, if only from a distance."

The Nominating Committee brought in the following slate of officers: President, Miss Margaret MacDougall, Vice-President, Mr. Physicking people occupies all his attention, Downtight lunacy! Mr. Stanley Carney, Miss Mildred MacKey and Miss Estelle MacAuland. Phillips will be able to use her influence.

Sick In England

The following letter has been received by Mr. Joseph D. Arsenault, Albany, regarding her son William who was wounded in France July 8th and is now very ill in Hospital in England. William went overseas at 16 and spent his 17th birthday in England. His nurse in writing says:

"Dear Mr. Arsenault, I am sure you must have been desperately worried about your son and, as we can now give you a little better news of him, I thought perhaps it would help to have a letter from someone in contact with him."

"Of course, it is still very early to say that he is getting better, but he is still seriously ill, but the doctors are all very pleased with the great improvement he has shown this last week."

"He is out on the balcony day and night now and is getting very sun burnt. The weather has been lovely for him this last week."

"Bill as everyone in the hospital calls him is one of the best patients I have ever nursed, he is so good and has such wonderful spirit."

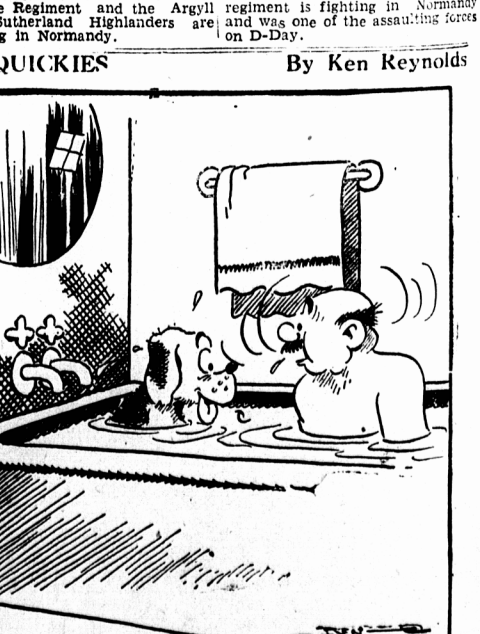

"He wrote to you himself on Friday and I think you will soon be hearing from him regularly; will try to write again next week and give you further information."

Yours sincerely
E. WIGHT
