SONIA

By VIDA HURST

INSTALLMENT XIII.

Sonia stared at Walter Henderson—at a loss to know what to say.

"Aren't you going to ask me in, Sonia?"

His eyes were grave and she realized that he had not come in a light mood.

She opened the door, saying slowly, "I can't believe it's you."

"Are you glad to see me?"

"Of course."

He put his hand upon the arm that wore Franklin's Christmas gift.

"Are you alone?"

She nodded.

"Sonia, I can't give you up until you definitely ask me to. I love you. I want you to marry me."

"After amazement filled her green eyes. She had not dreamed he even considered marriage.

Still holding her arm he drew her closer to him.

"You don't dislike me, do you, dear?"

"I like you awfully well," she answered, sincerely.

"You and Franklin are not engaged, are you Sonia?"

With little shivers racing up and down her spine she shook her head.

"I thought the way he acted the other night that you might be. Then I decided I might be mistaken. You simply didn't want him to misunderstand, was that it, Sonia?"

Fearing to betray some tiny ray of her beautiful hidden secret, Sonia replied, cautiously, "I shouldn't want any one in the office to think I would accept such an expensive present."

"That's what I thought. But, Sonia, you'd accept it as an engagement ring?"

"If I were engaged that would be different."

He drew the ring from his pocket. Once more she gazed upon the glorious, sparkling jewel. In spite of herself, she gasped a little.

"I can have it reset in a ring for your other finger. It is made for you, Sonia, as you are made for me."

"You interested me the night I met you at Maxine's. Later I was amused by your pretensions of experience. Then I beg your pardon, dear—I really began to believe you were 'yuk to vamp me. You tried so hard to convince me of your sophistication and you were living with Maxine."

Sonia stiffened. She dared not betray her friend's confidence, yet Maxine's words buzzed in her ear: "I had my first affair with Walter Henderson when I was 18."

He misunderstood her withdrawal. "Can't you forgive me, Sonia? I was a stupid fool. But I knew instantly when you refused my gift that you were the real thing. Men can scarcely believe in a girl like you. They are too rare."

"It doesn't matter," Sonia said coolly, "what you thought of me."

He pulled her closer.

"Does that mean you'll marry me?"

Her eyes were still dazed, but there was no hesitation in her answer.

"I can't, Mr. Henderson. It's awfully sweet of you to ask me. But I can't."

Her positive refusal did not seem to disconcert Walter Henderson.

"See here, Sonia, let's be sensible about this. I don't have to have an answer to-day. You should give my proposal at least the same amount of consideration you would a business proposition. That's fair, isn't it?"

"I suppose it is."

"I should like to meet your father and mother. That's my reason for coming down to Muncie. I wanted to see you in your own home."

Sonia lifted her head proudly. She had no intention of apologizing for these dreary rooms.

"I promised to go to church," she said. "Mother and dad will be disappointed if I don't come."

He smiled.

"Little did I expect to find my gay Sonia dressing for church!"

She said nothing.

"I was only teasing, dear. Run on to your room and dress while I have a smoke. I'll go to church with you."

"You needn't."

"I should enjoy it, Sonia. I haven't been in a church for years."

When they marched into the little church together she was glad she had spoken of him to her mother. The singing had begun, so she had no opportunity to introduce him to them, but she saw her father peering anxiously over his hymnbook. Other eyes wandered, too. Sonia held her head high with all her old arrogance. Let them see the sort of man who came from Chicago to find her. He was distinguished looking even there; doubly so in Muncie.

When the service was over he met her father and mother. Sidney, came up to greet her friend.

"He's gorgeous," she whispered to Sonia. "But I'm disappointed. I wanted to walk home with you. Walter refused Anna's invitation to dinner."

"I'm driving on at noon," he explained. "But, Sonia, I shall hope to see you soon in Chicago."

His eyes were affectionate and kind. Sonia found herself wishing that she might really care for him. Then the image of Franklin seemed to stand beside her, reproachfully.

"I didn't mean it, darling," she apologized, silently. Then aloud: "It was nice of you to look me up, Mr. Henderson. I'm going back to Chicago this afternoon."

"Shall I telephone you when I return?"

"Yes, do!"

He evidently understood that it would be embarrassing now for her to see him during business hours.

He left Sonia at the door of her home. Inside she found Anna and down curvins.

"A very nice-appearing gentleman," was her father's verdict.

"You say he is interested in the company?" asked Anna.

"Yes, he's very wealthy."

"Rather queer for him to stop in Muncie for such a little while."

Sonia said nothing. What a riot of excitement she would cause if she told them he had come to ask her to marry him.

Immediately after dinner Sidney telephoned.

"Can you come over a minute?"

"I haven't time. But I might meet you half way."

This suited Sidney. Neither of the girls wished to meet in the other's home. When they met, Sonia wasted no time in preliminaries.

"I understand you and Tom are engaged."

"We are, Sonia. I didn't write because I wanted to tell you myself."

"I think he's a peach," Sonia answered, warmly. "And he'll make you a wonderful husband."

"I have wondered, sometimes," Sidney admitted shyly, "if Tom ever made love to you. I know he used to like you awfully well."

"Forget it old thing! I'm too devilish for Tom. He was always shocked to death at me. And his mother would have fainted at the very idea."

"She's been awfully sweet to me."

"Why wouldn't she be? Well, I'm awfully happy for you, Sidney. Dad told me you had a ring."

Sidney exhibited her diamond.

"Of course," she explained, "we shall be married until we've both finished school. But that's only three years."

On three years! It seemed an eternity to the restless Sonia! She wondered what Sidney would say if she could see her wearing Walter's emerald in its exquisite setting.

"Tell me about Chicago," Sidney begged. "Do you have a wonderful time?"

"I certainly do."

"I knew you'd love it."

"It's my city," admitted Sonia, in a husky voice. "The moment I saw the outline of the buildings against the sky I knew I could never really belong anywhere else."

"Isn't that queer? I feel like that about Muncie. Yet you were born here, too."

They walked together in silence. Then Sidney asked, "Meet lots of men?"

"Some," Sonia confessed. "One or two have been very nice to me."

"That Mr. Henderson seemed lots older."

"He is one of the investors in the company."

"That reminds me, Sonia, do you know a salesman named Franklin Crane?"

At the sound of that name the blood rushed into Sonia's face. She suppressed an indistinct answer.

"The reason I asked," continued Sidney, serenely, "he's engaged to a cousin of mine."

"Not Franklin Crane?" Sonia cried sharply.

"Yes. She has a ring. I met him myself once, a long time ago."

The world reeled about Sonia. She heard a voice coming from a great distance.

"You're sure?"

"Of course! They've been engaged for a long time. Genevieve wrote that they were invited to a Christmas house-party together in Washington."

The sardonic humor of Sidney's news made Sonia's lips twist into a tortured smile.

"I believe he did say he was going to Washington for Christmas."

"Jimmie, your face is dirty again this morning!" exclaimed the teacher. "What would you say if I came to school every day with a dirty face?"

"I'd be too polite," granted Jimmie, "to say anything!"

It was the workmanship of Charles, a disciple of Lysippus, who spent twelve years in making it. It was at length overturned by an earthquake, after having stood 83 years. Its height was 105 feet. Some critics are of the opinion that the Colossus of Rhodes gave its name to the people among whom it stood. Hence they suppose that the Colossians in the Scripture to whom St. Paul wrote his epistle are in reality the inhabitants of Rhodes.

When the Saracens took possession of the island A. D. 672, the statue was prostrate on the ground. They sold it to the Jews who loaded 900 camels with brass, 720,000 pounds weight.

Under a modified type of democracy the Rhodians enjoyed a long period of remarkably good administration. The chief success of their government lay in the field of foreign politics, where they prudently avoided entanglement with foreign monarchs, but gained great prestige by energetic interference against aggressors who threatened the existing balance of power of the security of the sea.

Like the rest of Greece, it submitted to the victorious Alexander the Great. Upon Alexander's death 323 B. C. the people expelled the Macedonian garrison and henceforth not only maintained their independence, but acquired great political influence. The expansion of the Hellenistic age brought a special profit to Rhodes, whose standard of coinage and maritime law was the oldest in history.

During several centuries Rhodes remained in the power of the Greek empire. It long continued to maintain its prestige as a seat of learning.

Oldest Sea Law.

Rhodian law is the earliest system of maritime law known to history, said to be compiled by the Rhodians after they had by their commerce and naval victories, obtained the sovereignty of the sea.

Years before the Rhodians as illustrious for their naval discipline. The collection of maritime institutions termed Rhodian law is to be found in Venus. Some say that the Romans adopted these laws during the first Punic war. The leading points supposed to be borrowed from the Rhodian law relate to the shares of the officer and the crew of a ship; the punishment of piracy and plundering of wrecks and compensation payable to the heirs of the members who lost their lives in the service of the vessel. This law being generally accepted in the Mediterranean and handed down and accepted today.

After the death of Caesar, whose side the Rhodians had taken against Pompey in the civil war, they were defeated in a naval engagement by Caesarius in 42 B. C.

The City of Rhodes became famous as a center of pictorial and plastic art. It gave rise to a school of eclectic oratory, whose chief representatives were Apollonius Melon, the teacher of Cicero. It was the birthplace of the stoic philosopher Panaetius; the home of the poet Apollonius Rhodius; and the historian Posidonius.

Many of the statues now in the art museums were the workmanship of Rhodian sculptors before the Christian war.

At the time of his marriage he was a school teacher; then for years was a contractor, building several sections of railroad in Canada and the U. S. During this period he was also a lay preacher, and conducted Sunday services for the men employed in his camps, and acted as supply for vacant pulpits. Finally he gave up mercantile occupations, and devoted his whole time to the ministry. For a number of years he served the Minnesota Conference, filling pulpits at Pine City; Rush City; Racine; High Forest; and ect.
