SANDRA EMULATES SANDRA
CHAPTER LXXXIX.

Everett had been called to the telephone almost before he had closed the door. Hetty had answered the call, and had said: "A lady wishes to speak to you, sir." I stood at the head of the stairs, ready to rush down and welcome Everett, when she spoke. He had not seen me, so I drew back in to shadow and waited.

"Yes—really, I feel flattered. Yes—in half or three quarters of an hour. Very well, I promise." As he hung up the receiver, I called: "Is that you, Everett?" "Yes." "You will have to hurry—you are late tonight!" He had come up the stairs as I spoke. "I am going out, so run down and get your dinner."

"Out to dinner?" I could not keep the disappointment from my voice, although I held up my face for a kiss as usual.

"Where are you going, Everett?" I have been blue all day. I had so hoped we might have a nice evening! To my surprise, he answered my question instead of either ignoring or evading it as was his custom.

"I am going to Mrs. Barton's. She was a fourth for bridge, and asked me to bring her."

"She didn't ask me?" "No," impatiently. "Didn't I tell you she only wanted me to make a fourth at bridge?"

"But I could look on. It would be better than sitting alone." He paid no attention to my remark, but hurried with his dressing. Hetty just then announced dinner, and he told me—no, ordered me—to go down at once.

"And do not sit up for me. I shall be very late most likely. Irma's bridge parties are usually long drawn-out affairs."

"I don't want any dinner, Everett. If I have to eat alone. Let me stay with you until you are dressed. Later if I am hungry, I will have Hetty bring me something on a tray."

"Go down to your dinner at once! I am surprised that you should act so foolishly."

Forcing back my tears, I left him. I was so hurt that I did not call to him when he went out or run to kiss him as usual. He just put his head in the dining room door long enough to say:

"Good night," and to repeat his caution about retiring.

"Why should he be with another woman while I am alone." I said to Put half an inch of MENNENS SHAVING CREAM on your shaving brush. Work up the lather on your face. Shave.

Notice how cleanly your razor cuts? Rub your hand over your chin. Feel the smoothness? Notice how comfortable your face feels? That's shaving efficiency. You never knew there could be such a difference in shaving soaps, did you?

myself, as I choked back a sob. "It isn't fair. And Leola wouldn't sit meekly here alone while he was having a good time. I won't either—I'll do something."

I thought of the letters, but somehow I just couldn't read any more love talk of Leola's. But Everett had said he would be late. I would go up into the attic after Hetty and Mrs. Gray were in bed, and bring the rest of the letters down to my room and hide them, then return the keys to the place which I had taken them.

I wandered into the music room and played a little. Then the telephone rang. To my surprise and embarrassment, it was Walter Kemp.

"Are you and Mr. Graham spending the evening at home, and if so, may I join you?" he asked.

"Mr. Graham is out and I—have a headache. (Please excuse me tonight.)"

"I am so sorry. Is there anything I can do for you?"

"No, thank you, I shall go to bed and sleep it off. Good night."

"Good night—but I shall call and ask to come some other time."

A little while after I had hung up the receiver, Hetty brought me a lovely box of roses. I wished they had been some other flowers—roses made me think of Leola.

What should I tell Everett? Would he be angry because Mr. Kemp had sent them? Suddenly I knew! I would hold the roses close in my arms until they wilted. That Leola held them so because they were from the man she loved and I for no reason save that she had done so, never struck me as ridiculous—at the time.
