Spaniards Will Traverse Columbus's Route In Exact Duplicate Of Discoverer's Flagship

MADRID, Oct. 1.—Seafarers along ocean routes this winter will rub their eyes when they see a tiny sailing vessel from another age gliding slowly past them to vanish in the mist.

What they will see will be a recreation of the Santa Maria, Columbus's flagship of 220 tons, with two masts, a dark hole for the crew below decks, and the captain's cabin under the raised stern just where the ship gets a sickening roll from the impact of huge combers against the tiny cockleshell sides.

Twenty-five Spanish sailor youths not half the number of Columbus's crew of fifty-two, will man the vessel under the command of Captain Julio Guillen, who is thirty-five years old.

With hardback to last for three months and water for five months, no instruments or comforts post-dating 1492, not even a radio in case of emergency, this exact replica of Columbus's flagship will slip away some time in February from Palos, where Columbus set sail, and will follow the great explorer's route.

Allowing for fierce Atlantic gales and for calms, they should sight the coast of Santo Domingo some fifty days later. The ship will bear a stone from the La Rabida Monastery for the lighthouse memorial to Columbus there.

American school children will get a chance to hear from the lips of the living what Columbus's hard voyage was like, for the crew will then risk life and limb in a three-year passage through the gales of Cape Horn to Canada, and the voyage may even take the tiny craft through the Great Lakes to Chicago for the 1933 exposition. This flagship is well remembered in Charlottetown having visited this Port some years ago.
