ANSWER—Break the engagement. If you were on the very steps of the church, turn back if you realized that you had made a big mistake in your feelings and that you no longer wanted to go on with the marriage.

A HOME ON THE RANGE By Bentley Ridge

TELLFORTH, A MARRIED MAN? nics there. You must come over." The homestead, a big, white-painted, rambling one-story place, stood in a large well-kept garden behind vineyards of poplars. Spring buds were coming into bloom in the lower-beds, incisors, the turniture might be very "ordinary" to eyes used to the exotic fancies of ultra-modern interior decorators, but it was unquestionably very comfortable, with its warm carpets and paneled walls, the log-fire burning in the wide hearth, and the trolley laden with bright silver and an array of cakes, scones and biscuits. Mrs. Kane was a plump, cheerful woman, with wavy greying hair, an expensive navy-blue morning-robe, and work-worn hands. She explained that the men were all outside; "Elizabeth of England." "It must be very uncomfortable over at Petersdown—the Crowleys who had it before had so little idea of furnishing, and the dust must be thick all over everything, too." Mrs. Dainty said at once, airily: "My daughter and I are going back to Christchurch to-day. My husband intends to have the house done up for us." That was that. Myrie hoped that they were going to find it as easy to get the house done up as her mother's tone implied. "Oh, really?" Mrs. Kane and Rosemary both looked rather surprised. "We thought you had come up to stay—Evelyn, dear, pass Mrs. Dainty a cake."

Their collier blown up by a mine along the east coast, some of crew swim for rescue ship as comrades are picked up by lifeboat from merchant ship. Keel of sinking craft is in background.

Evelyn, a bright-eyed girl of ten, who had come in with the tea wagon, had been watching them keenly. She looked so hard—and it seemed, so coldly—at Myrie, that Rosemary was moved to remark, while Mrs. Dainty and Mrs. Kane talked. "Evelyn is home from school getting over whooping cough, so she's staying with us for a while." She finds it rather lonely at home." The child walked away with a conscious air. "Oh!" said Myrie, politely. "I imagined she was your sister." "No, no," she's Evelyn Tellforth." Myrie's attention was arrested. "We met a man called Tellforth on the way here." "Yes—that's Evelyn's father. It was he who told us you had arrived." This child's father! For some reason it had never occurred to Myrie that Tellforth was married. So that was why Evelyn's face had seemed familiar. Those red-brown eyes...

Myrie decided to stay. Rosemary, with a willing admiration of Myrie's looks, her grace, and her sophisticated charm, decided that she would be difficult to understand. Rosemary laughed when anything was funny—Myrie only seemed to laugh when something was unpleasant. "That's what is called cynicism," thought Rosemary, naively. Myrie bestowed herself to remark how delicious the cake was. "Yes, Rosemary made that. She's a wonderful cook—a wonderful housekeeper altogether," said Mrs. Kane, with a satisfied glance at her daughter. "Really—how clever!" said Mrs. Dainty, and her ultra-English voice tinkled into a condescending laugh. "I'm afraid I have never baked a cake in my life." Myrie was irritated, and looked at her mother's carefully-nurtured elegance with a new eye. "I wonder," she thought, "are we really such 'nice' people, after all? Isn't it rather stupid to be so proud of being useless?"

Myrie looked more carefully. "No," she said. "It's that man Tellforth." "Oh, yes. He said he would come over, didn't he?" said Mrs. Dainty, and stopped to wait for them. Myrie waited, too, with a perceptible chill in her manner. "How do you go?" said Tellforth, as they came up. "How do you do?" said Mrs. Dainty, and immediately began to tell her husband where they had been. Myrie said nothing. Mrs. Dainty and the Captain moved towards the house, and Tellforth and Myrie followed. To-day she noticed he wore a leather pull-over to keep off the rain. "Your father has been having a look round the place," Tellforth thought. "I don't think he's disappointed. He shouldn't be." How oddly these colonials talked, thought Myrie. As if they had known one another all their lives. (To be Continued)

A feu-de-jolie literally means fire of joy, and is a demonstration of disciplined rejoicing inspired by the health of the reigning monarch. The ceremony varies somewhat in various parts of the Empire and the manner which tradition requires certain regiments to carry it out. The feu-de-jolie is customarily fired on the King's birthday or the day which has been designated for celebrations in honor of his birthday. This year, in Charlottetown, because of the decision to observe Army Week, it was felt that during this week was an appropriate time to allow the Canadian Army an opportunity to express in this historic manner its loyalty, to the Commander-in-Chief and its rejoicing in His Majesty's continuing good health, subject as it now is to the great strain imposed on it by the responsibilities of the War. His Honour Lieut.-Governor B. W. LePage will represent His Majesty on this occasion. The public should take advantage of this opportunity to witness this interesting ceremony.
