SILENCE.

Not to publish abroad what has been said in confidence; not to divulge any affair that may cause scandal; not to discover one's own plans, which, being discovered, may fail; not to show that we are aware of the faults and the bad actions of others, because men with those faults hate those who know them; not to show that we perceive the ill which men bear to ourselves or to those whom we love; not to show that we know any harm men have done us, or that we feel ourselves offended; not to run risks of brawls and quarrels. . . . To all these ends, silence is necessary, and is not reprehensible. And though it may be very hard to live with one's friends in this manner, and to be silent as to their affairs, nevertheless reason teaches us to fix our eyes on what signifies most, and to do no harm or prejudice to ourselves.—Richelieu.
