Married Quarters

By DAVID LYALL

Continued

Bradford's face flushed a dull red. "Don't you see I'm avoiding the market? I'm going round to Aunt Naomi's now."

Jane looked the disappointment she felt. She was a frank, ingenious creature, a little loud in voice and style, but a general favourite.

She did not suspect that her cousin was shrinking from her, mentally and physically, and wanted to get away.

"Oh, all right; I'll say so-long, and I'll be down for you at four sharp tomorrow. My, won't it make Sylvie turn green with envy! Shouldn't wonder if she comes down on the step."

"You seem rather dull and not like yourself," she added sympathetically. "I suppose it's natural, but you'll soon be all right when you've been at home for a bit and had a jolly time among us all. Markyate's very lively just now, and they're a jolly crowd up at the camp. I can tell you Sylvie and me are having the time of our lives. I seem an awful thing to say, Jim, and perhaps you'll hit me with your crutch for saying it, but we don't want the war to end for a little while yet."

Jim's smile was grim rather than appreciative, and with a bow and a half-salute he began to move off in the direction of the little by-way behind church where Aunt Naomi's emporium was to be found.

"Perhaps it's shell shock," said Jan Cotman to herself as she watched him disappear round the corner. "What ever it is, he's got the hump badly. He looks as if he had no use for any of us. My hat! but we'll cheer him up tomorrow."

Mrs. Cotman was Isaac Bradford's elder sister the younger and unmarried one, Naomi, lived in an old-fashioned house with a low doorway and two bow-fronted windows under deep overhanging eaves. From above the doorway hung a quaint sign bearing the legend: "N. Bradford, Curio Antiques."

One window was full of glass and quaint brass things, door handles, candlesticks, knockers, chestnut roasters, warming pans, all the paraphernalia beloved of the collector. The other window contained brightly-coloured wools and embroidery silks also the patterns beloved of the women who still cling to the old-time womanly occupations. The curio part of the business Naomi had created, and so fine and discriminating was her taste that her name was known to those interested far beyond the confines of Markyate-at-Stone. She was busy with a feather duster in the shop when her nephew's tall figure darkened the doorway. Instantly she ran to meet him, tears suffusing her soft eyes.

"Why, Jim, my dear boy, when did you come? I had not even heard that you were expected."

Aunt Naomi had hardly a trace in her voice of the guttural Markyate accent. She spoke more correctly than any of her relations, possibly because she read so much, and had so often to talk to cultured and well educated people. Jim Bradford suddenly felt that Aunt Naomi, in spite of the shop, might be an asset to him, if the day ever came when he had to count his assets.

"I came last night," he answered, as he bent to kiss her. "Don't look so woebegone! I'm feeling nearly quite fit, really."

"Oh, but these!" she said, touching the crutches pitifully as she settled him in a Jacobean chair for which she refused fifty guineas.

"Oh, these! I'm discarding them perhaps tomorrow. I've just met Jane Cotman. She says she'll take me up to their new house to-morrow in the new car, so I'll leave my crutches behind—good, faithful fellows they've been! I promised mother she should break them up, but I rather think I'll find a corner for them and label them 'Well done.'"

"Dear, dear; and what you've been through, Jim, since we saw you last! Was it very terrible? I've got to the stage when I can't read descriptions of battles, but I did read the story of the 'Tenth at Thiezval.'"

"It was a good scrap," was all the soldier said. "Say, Aunt Naomi, you don't change, thank God! This dear little place is just the same. How's business?"

"Good on the distaff side," she said with a little smile, which made her thin, small face sweet and young. "So you met Jane Cotman, did you? What times these are for the young, Jim! But I'm only an old-fashioned woman, and there are signs and portents I don't like."
