Address by J. Arnold Mowry, St. John, N. B. Grand Chancellor, Knights of Pythias, Grand Domain of the Maritime Provinces.
The vocal numbers by Mrs. Fred Cox and Mr. Ben Acorn were splendidly rendered and the readings by Mr. D. Edgar Shaw which were his own original composition were both clever and well delivered.

A small, but select audience of Knights, were gathered in the hall to enjoy the program and to listen to the address of the Grand Chancellor, Mr. J. Arnold Mowry of St. John, N. B. Knights of Pythias, Grand Domain of the Maritime Provinces. Mr. Mowry taking as his subject "Pythalism" delivered a most inspiring and interesting address to the brethren assembled and to all who might be listening in.

Telegrams and telephone messages were received from many points in the Maritimes telling of appreciation of the programme, including a telegram of congratulation from relatives in Moncton to Mrs. Fred Cox.

At the conclusion many of the Knights spoke enthusiastically of the benefits of a local Broadcasting station and expressed themselves as in favor of a more united public support of the local station in regard to studio accommodation.

Entertainment By Y. P. S. of Trinity Church

The final meeting for the season of the Young Peoples Society of Trinity Church was held last night in Hartz Memorial Hall, and took the form of a social evening, at which the students of the Prince of Wales College and their friends were the guests of the Society. A program consisting of a tableau from "The Merchant of Venice," a short dramatic sketch, and several vocal and instrumental numbers was first carried out, and was heartily enjoyed by the audience. The performance of those taking part, especially in the dramatic numbers, was indeed worthy of note, and it can safely be said that such excellent acting and characterization is rarely seen in wholly amateur productions put on in the city.

The latter part of the evening was spent in the playing of games and other forms of social entertainment, and dainty refreshments were served before the evening was brought to a close.

72nd Annual Commencement

When people looked for short hours there were some who still continued to give generously of their ability, strength, perseverance, and knowledge. Discipline and application, he would repeat, were necessary in any kind of life, from the man with the pick right up to the highest class. There were hours of drudgery for them all, and some would chafe and want to get out of it. There was always temptation. Most persons were about as lazy as they could well afford to be, and the tendency of all men was to follow the line of least resistance. No young man should allow himself to develop the characteristic of being shy of any good hard work that he had to perform. People would expect the graduate of St. Dunstan's to possess the intuition and practices of a Christian, and to conduct himself as one who was always above reproach; one who could at all times look every man in the face.

In his endeavor to meet all his duties the young man should make it a point to be always punctual. Some people became sadly twisted in their methods, and there was everywhere a general tendency to get into slovenly and unbusinesslike habits of life. There was often regrettable lack of attention, punctuality, and promptness. But fairness in one's dealings always won out in the end. The Americans were wont to laugh at the methods of business as practiced by the English, because the offices of the latter were not always bustling and noisy; but the English were still able to get business, they had the business, and they would keep their business, all because of their honesty, integrity, and the fact that they were trusted. These attributes would bring business to any man, and in the end make him successful. The public soon found him out.

These things His Lordship said he would strongly impress upon the graduates, and further he would ask them to keep always before them that high vision of which Dismet speaks when he said that a young man either looked high or low. If his standard of life was low it was below that of the average man. If the vision was high then there was something worth striving for, and if he failed to reach it even at that he gained more than if his aim had been lower and his attempt had succeeded. No man who acted straight and took the honorable open course would be sorry for his decision.

Another thing in which the graduates should strive to give of their best was in the matter of co-operation. There was nothing that this country needed more. It needed its people to stand by it. It was not the clever ones who ran away, but the cowards. There was room enough in this country for every one. Moreover, they should be loyal to the Island, both by earnest co-operation and by a spirit of optimism. Only thus could the prevailing spirit of depression be dissipated. They should also be loyal to their college, it had been said that they would never meet again. But other college classes had their reunions, to which they brought their troubles and successes, and it would be a good thing to try and arrange a re-union of this sort for this class. A spirit of lasting loyalty to their Alma Mater would help in many ways, morally and on occasion, financially. The Alma Mater expected them to do their duty along that line. The people, said the speaker, expected great things of this graduating class. They were here today in such numbers because they were interested in them.

In concluding the speaker asked the graduates to live always by the law and religion of God, to be true to themselves, their God, and their fellow beings.

The Year's Work

The Rector, Rev. D. P. Croken, in giving his report of the year's work, first thanked the visitors for their presence, the donors for their prizes, and Bishop Morrison for coming at great inconvenience to himself to address the graduates. He welcomed his Lordship back to St. Dunstan's. During the year the students in general had done good, faithful work, although some had failed to pass their examinations. As the University endeavored to help the greatest number of boys possible, the student body included some who were not altogether well grounded in the elementary subjects, and the first year course was so crowded that but little work could be put on these. It seemed advisable that another year should be added to the course. The graduating class composed very favorably with that of other years, and as the members of the class were assured that not only had they found the address inspirational and stimulating, but that in after years they would often recall his Lordship's wonderful remarks, and to the profit of some of the suggestions he had made today. This would be the case partly because of the manliness and one who always had the interests of the University at heart, left behind him the example of an exemplary life.

His Lordship Bishop O'Leary, who spoke next congratulated the graduates and students on an afternoon well spent. The reverend Rector had said that it had been an uneventful year, and that was one word which for any college or institution meant a great deal. It meant that the ordinary work had gone steadily along all during the year. The speaker felt happy to note that it had been a very successful year. He regretted that the state of health of the Rector necessitated his laying down the duties assumed under the rectorship. He was being changed to a parish where it was hoped his health would return in its regular strength and vigor.

His Lordship said he wished to thank the Rector publicly for the good work he had done for the college in the short time he had been its Rector. He had made his mark not only on the character of the institution, but also on the character of the individuals who had attended it. The influence he had had showed the effect of a long training and a life of sacrifice and sincere application in the interests of St. Dunstan's. The speaker hoped that the students would enjoy a pleasant vacation. But they should remember that they went out as men of the Red and White. They should live up to the Red and White with red
