CELERY

The medicinal properties in celery are now so well recognized that it "goes without saying" that what intelligent people want to know where can we procure it, and at a reasonable price. We grow celery in such large quantities, that we are enabled to place it (direct from the producer to the consumer) at a price that will make you smile. Think of it, a large case (half barrel) size of celery for $2.50—3 cases for $7.00—6 cases $13.50.
Celery is not washed, but intended for keeping for some time. Send in your orders for as many cases as required, not forgetting to inclose the necessary cash, and they will be forwarded to your nearest shipping point, state whether by freight or express.
(To non-booking stations add charges.)

COLONEL MOREHEN, from Toronto is visiting this City today and will be the speaker at the Salvation Army Hall on Great George Street tonight at 8 p.m., also at Summerside on Tuesday night. The Colonel is a man who has travelled extensively and held many important positions in England, Canada, and Newfoundland. He is an able speaker, a good singer, with more than usual ability to entertain. He now holds the position of Young People's Secretary for Eastern Canada extending from Fort William to Newfoundland, also the Bermuda's. An interesting and instructive evening is assured to those who shall attend.

MAJ. BEST'S ADDRESS.—An eloquent appeal to the churches not to neglect prayer and to reorganize the family altar in their homes was made in the Methodist Church yesterday morning by Maj. Tom Best, religious work secretary, National Council, Y.M.C.A. Maj. Best also referred to the work of the Y.M.C.A. since its organization in England 78 years ago. It started as a Christian Association of twelve young men and today its membership exceeds 1,500,000. Last year its program of activities cost $47,000,000 and contributions (totaling $24,000,000) were made towards the work. That it is a growing organization is proved by the fact that within the last ten years, it has doubled its membership, its property value, and its program. The Association had been subject during the war, the speaker said, to unjust and untruthful criticism but this has altogether passed away within the past two years, and the Association has more active friends today than ever in its history. The Association originated as the child of the Church, but it is now the Young Man of the Church and is a place at the councils of the parent organization for a more enthusiastic support of the local branch and for a wider recognition of the work it is achieving in cooperation with the churches. In the evening Maj. Best delivered an inspiring message in the Baptist Church.

been smashed to pieces, and it is my firm conviction that in time the same thing will happen to our party."

As for Griffith-Boscawen and himself he must say that as a result of that dynamic force they were prepared to go into the wilderness than stay under its influence.

Captain Pretzman then moved the "Die-Hard" motion, which declared that the meeting considered that: "The Conservative party while willing to operate with the Coalition Liberals, fights the election as an independent party with its own leader and its own programme." It was seconded by Major G. Lanefox and when Colonel Midway made a speech in favor of Lloyd George, it looked as though the meeting was in for a long and perhaps inconclusive debate.

But then came a change. Bonar Law, who had been listening quietly, arose and in two minutes had turned decisively the scales against a continuance of the Coalition. He began by saying that he had been doubtful until the last moment about attending the meeting and that it was only because he had considered that in a crisis like the present he must either come and say what he thought, or cease to be a member of Parliament, that he had decided to attend. He had a warm friendship for Chamberlain and believed that nobody could have avoided getting into the serious position in which he stood.

Greatest Crisis

He went on: "Now we are up against what I think is the greatest crisis that has happened in my lifetime, leaving out, of course, the more terrible crisis of the war. We have to face it, and each of us has to say quite honestly what he thinks is the best way of facing it. The real question is, ought the present Coalition to continue? Chamberlain himself will be the first to admit that there really is a crisis and that the same coalition and under the same prime minister. The question that has to be decided is not something that affects the House of Commons alone. It affects every Unionist in every constituency. If it were possible even at that last moment—I am afraid it is not—I would say, let Chamberlain and those who think with him, and those who disagree with him, submit to the party the question, shall we or shall we not continue the coalition and let us abide by their decision. But if it is not possible, then what is the position we are faced with? I am sorry to say an inevitable split, and I am afraid the suggestion I have put cannot be adopted."

"I confess frankly that in the immediate crisis in front of us I do personally attach more importance to keeping our party a united body than to winning the next election."

No Fear of Labor

Then Law took up the argument Chamberlain had pressed of the danger of the Labor party gaining power if the Coalition was abandoned, and declared that in his opinion it was not only baseless, but actually worked the other way. "Whatever is the result of the election," he said, "I personally have no fear of a Labor Government coming in, but all the same in my opinion, for what it is worth having a party composed of every one who was not labor or with labor, as the only alternative will inevitably have the effect of making a Labor Government some day."

without any law of God to interfere with their decision. It is like a marriage where one of the parties is determined to go away, and if so there nothing that you can do will make it a real union. I am sorry that that is the conclusion to which I have come.

He was certain that if that meeting decided to stand by the Coalition the party would be split, and a new party would be formed from the dissentients. That was the worst of that would be that what was known as the Conservative Party would become more and more reactionary.

"I for one say," went on Law, "that though what you call the reactionary element in our party has always been there and must always be there, if it is the sole element our party is absolutely lost. Therefore, if you agree with Mr. Chamberlain in this crisis, I will tell you what I think will be the result. You will see a repetition of what happened after Peel passed the Corn Bills. The minority that it cast off will slowly become a Conservative Party, but it will take a generation before it gets back to the influence which a party ought to have."

Good Chance to Win.

"So," said Law, "I shall vote in favor of our going into the election as a party fighting to win (Loud cheers) and though we may not win—and I may say that my opinion is of no more value than anyone else's—if we could have gone as a united Unionist Party I think there would be at least a good chance. For these reasons I very reluctantly, I shall vote in favor of no coalition but in doing his Law disclaimed earnestly any personal hostility to Lloyd George just as he had helped to end Asquith's government, because he had felt that it had lost the confidence of the country, so he was now voting to bring to an end the Coalition.

"I say today that whether it is Lloyd George's fault or force of circumstances—and I think in the main it is force of circumstances, for believe me no prime minister could have avoided unpopularity in the years through which we have gone—in my view there is precisely the same feeling in our party today that it must end, and for that reason there is no good trying to keep it alive." (Loud cheers.)

One former leader of the Conservative party had spoken and had given all the weight of his influence against the Coalition and the die seemed already cast. But there was yet one more effort to save the day for Lloyd George. It came from Lord Balfour, whose reputation has never stood higher than it does today. With all his great authority, he made an earnest appeal for the continuance of the alliance with the Coalition Liberals. Picking up Baldwin's allusion to Lloyd George as a great dynamic force, and his suggestion that it had already destroyed the Liberal party and was now in process of destroying the Conservative party he said: "That can surely only mean that in the cabinet Mr. Lloyd George, leading as he does the Liberal element in this co-operative government, is gradually forcing his Conservative colleagues to adopt Liberal principles in preference to their own. I have watched the proceedings of the cabinet, of which I was a member for many years, and I personally have seen no sign of this operation, and nobody has ever suggested such a sign. Under no circumstance whatever has a division of opinion—when there has been any division of opinion—been influence upon party lines, and if there has been a change of opinion, if there has been a profound modification of views, believe me the modification of views has taken place on the part of the Prime Minister much more than on the part of his Conservative colleagues."

Lord Balfour suggested as a plain, practical commonsense way out of the party's difficulties, that it say: "Differences used to divide us; differences may again divide us; differences do not divide us at the present moment. On the contrary, we are agreed upon all the great principles which are being threatened. Let us remain united, not only allies, but friends, until circumstances arise which make co-operation any longer impossible." So he declared: "I strongly urge this meeting to support its leader."

This practically ended the discussion and the vote was taken. It was an open vote, each man marking a card on which his name was printed. It resulted in 187 votes for Captain Pretzman's motion for a separate Conservative leader, to 87 against. The announcement of the result was received with wild cheers, which were heard and re-echoed by the crowd in the street. If the defeat of the Coalition was not altogether unexpected, the size of the majority they were followed by that of the Unionist whips, and of the secretaries also asked to be relieved of their offices. Already the ministry was visibly crumbling, there could be no longer any question of continuing the Coalition in its present form, and whatever happened the Conservatives must stand on their own feet and be prepared to take over the reins of the Government immediately was impossible, and there was but one thing to do. The Prime Minister should be invited to do so. The result was that in the next few hours Lloyd George at Downing Street received a shower of resignations from Unionist ministers.
