

She Could Not Work HEADACHES Were So Severe

Mrs. A. Rich, Burdall, Sask., writes: "I was troubled with very severe headaches, and sometimes I could not do my work. "One day a friend told me about BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS and advised me to give it a trial. I decided to do so, and after taking a few bottles I found it had done me a world of good, and I haven't had any headaches for a long time now."

"Jealous Hearts"

MILDRED BARBOUR

THE TEST OF POWER.

Elmor was entertaining Danelli at tea in her new apartment. She was not at all flattered that the infatuated man had turned down three invitations to fashionable parties that same afternoon to accept from her slender white hands a cup of tea. She was merely amused. The soft gray-green of the walls and draperies seemed specially designed as a background for Elmor's copper-colored hair and her slim, willowy body. She looked like a dryad in some woodland glade. At least, that was the way Danelli had expressed it when he came in that afternoon and found her, pensively and lovely, before the fire. "I've brought you a little gift," he told her, as he bent over her hand and kissed it. "Something that is needed to complete this perfect scene and something that, to me, expresses you—all flame and song." He went to the door and signaled to his chauffeur, who carefully lifted down from the driver's seat a bulky object wrapped in heavy paper. He bore it into Elmor's tiny drawing-room, unwrapped it, and revealed two scarlet cardinals with crested heads, swinging in a lacquered cage. "They came from South America and are said to be rather rare," Danelli explained, while the chauffeur gathered up the wrappings and departed. "They sing with the voice of angels." Elmor regarded them with interest. "Better than I?" she asked Danelli audaciously. "That," he assured her gallantly with a bow, "would be impossible." But she pouted as she went back to the fire and began to concoct with her usual carelessness of results, the beverage that only courtesy could call tea. "I wanted the truth, not compliments," Danelli seated himself opposite her and leaned forward, his elbows on his knees, his dark eyes following her slightest gesture. "The two are always synonymous when spoken of you. Is it not so, my adored?" She laughed, satisfied. "Danelli, you're incorrigible! I'm convinced you call every girl of your acquaintance 'my adored'." "But of course! Why not?" He drew out a gold cigarette-case and, extracting a monogrammed cigarette, tapped it on one perfectly manicured thumb-nail. "They like it, these American ladies. But there is always one for whom it is said from the heart. And you, carissima, are that one." "A neat explanation!" laughed Elmor. "It's difficult to catch you napping, and, if one does, you always fall back on the excuse of an imperfect knowledge of English. Danelli, you're a fraud—but a clever fraud and I like you." He accepted the cup she handed him and smiled quietly into its amber contents. "You shall end by loving me." "If I was ever foolish enough to do that, I should end with a broken heart," Elmor told him, with a

Women, Your Manifold Duties Requires Strength

St. Catherine's, Ont.—"During my early married life Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription was very helpful to me as a tonic and nerve. I had become all run-down, my nerves were all upset, I could not sleep, and was weak and miserable. I was advised by my mother to try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and it relieved me of the nervousness and I made me a well, strong woman. Since then I have always recommended it to weak women."—Mrs. M. F. Slack, 5 Francis St., All drugists. Fluid or tablets. shrug. She could see that he liked that, as she had known that he would. The implication flattered him. He was very vain of his feminine conquests. The little compliment took the sting out of her earlier words. He stirred his cup of tea complacently, took a sip—and set it down. Even his infatuation wasn't strong enough to cope with Elmor's tea. But she wasn't at all offended. She laughed good-naturedly and said: "I know it's rotten stuff. I've never learned to make tea. Millie-cent always did it at home." She lounged gracefully in her chair and stifled a tiny yawn. "What a horrid day it's been!" she remarked pensively. "I've been bored to death ever since I woke up." He glanced significantly toward the rosewood piano in the corner and then seated himself at it. She rose and stood beside him. "Have you practiced?" She frowned. "Oh, yes. For eternities—or so it seemed. Danelli, I want to do something frightfully exciting and different. I'd like you to take me to dinner at some unusual place." His eyes lighted with pleasure and then clouded. "But, carissima, I have already accepted an invitation to dine at the house of an American lady." His words were a challenge to Elmor. She'd been only half serious about dinner, but, now that she knew he was definitely engaged, she determined to test her power, to make him break his engagement, if possible. Her lovely lips pouted. She sighed. "How disappointing! I suppose she is much more beautiful than I!" "She is old and ugly," said Danelli, rather shortly. "Mrs. Agatha Archers Arnold," cried Elmor delightedly. "Danelli frowned. "She has been very kind to me," he began, a trifle apologetically, but Elmor was yawning again, prettily, and she interrupted him to say: "Never mind, I'll ring up Alan Jacobs. He told me to—the first night I was free for dinner." Danelli sprang to his feet, his cheeks reddening. Jacobs was a musician of note and Danelli's greatest rival, though the two pretended to be friends. Elmor had met him at Danelli's studio. "That you shall never do. Jacobs is my friend—yes. But not a good friend for you." Elmor's eyes smiled maliciously, but she only said plaintively, "I really like him, and, since I'm all alone tonight—" Danelli cast a swift glance around him. "Where is your telephone?" he demanded abruptly. Elmor's white lids hid the triumph in her eyes. She motioned toward her tiny dressing-room. He went in and shut the door, but she listened intently enough to hear him ask for Mrs. Arnold; after that, with a satisfied smile, she relaxed in her chair and began to think of other things—what gown she would choose to ensnare a new man who had loomed on her social horizon, for instance. Danelli came back presently, looking a trifle flushed. But he took her hand and lifted it to his lips. "My happiness for tonight is in your hands. What will you do to reward me for my so abominable rudeness to a lady?" she asked. "What do you want?" she asked audaciously, her strange provocative eyes glinting with a submerged humor as he stared into them. He drew a quick breath. "You said you wanted something different. Come to my studio and Jap will prepare a Japanese dinner for you. The dishes are strange and exotic. We will eat seated on cushions on the floor, in native fashion. You shall wear a brocade robe that was once the bridal gown of an Oriental princess. You will come with me, my adored?" "A Japanese dinner in a studio in America, with an Italian," murmured Elmor reflectively. "That should be an amusing combination. Of course I'll come!" "Just what excuses did you make to Mrs. Arnold?" she asked lazily, as they were on their way to Danelli's studio. He chuckled. "I told her that my very dearest friend from Naples had arrived and was being held at Ellis Island by your so strict American government; that it was imperative for me to go with my country's consul and assist him to enter. That is what you call a 'good one,' is it not?" "The best ever!" laughed Elmor. "But it would be amusing, just the same, if she didn't believe you and came popping into the studio." Changed oftener, washed oftener— Our modern standards demand fresh, clean clothes MEN insist on it, as well as women. Children's happiness and welfare depend on it. To all of us now it is a necessity, not a luxury. Garments are more valuable, of finer fabrics, more beautiful colorings. Each garment makes more trips to the tub. What of its safety? Poor quality soap may blur a garment's colours, weaken its fabric, ruin its value, shorten its life. Do you realize how much more value is going into your tubs now than before? How are you protecting it? Remember, it is difficult to detect the harmful quality of cheap soap—until it is too late, and the damage has been done forever. To protect your garments you must have the certainty that the soap you use is safe. You do not have to hunt. No need to make risky experiments. There is one soap you know is safe. Over forty years have proved it. Surprise Soap has always been safe, for finest fabrics and delicate colours. They all need the SAFETY, and gentle thoroughness of Surprise Soap more than ever before. Surprise Soap was first made in St. Stephen, N.B., 44 years ago on the policy that quality should be the first consideration. This policy has never been altered and quality has improved with advancing knowledge, keeping pace with the modern requirements. SURPRISE SOAP A PURE HARD SOAP SURPRISE SOAP
