A Golden Story Of The Silver Fox

Publicity is given to the silver fox industry in an article appearing this month in "The Greg Writer," a magazine published in New York for writers of the Greg system of shorthand, which has a wide circulation among reporters and stenographers, especially in the United States. The article, which is entitled "A Golden Story of the Silver Fox," by Robert G. Hodgson, is printed in shorthand. Following is a transcription:

"Fable tells us of Jason and his quest for the Golden Fleece. Today we find in the silver fox fur the Golden Fleece of modern times; the fur that has for centuries taken trappers into the wastes of the cold, snowy North Country in the hope of securing the pelt of one such animal."

"What is a silver fox, you ask? Briefly, it is an albino or freak—a marmotte born into a red-headed family. Just the opposite to casting any reflection on the mother's or father's lineage, it means that the parent was possessed of an element of special vigor which resulted in a peculiar intensifying of all the pigments, transmitting red into black and carrying with it an unusual vigor of growth and fineness of texture, producing the lightest, softest, thickest, warmest, most lustrous of furs; the fur worth more than its weight in gold—the world famous silver fox."

"The hair of the silver fox is three-colored, a slaty blue capped by a portion of black, with the black portion capped with a silver band, which silver band is surmounted with a black tip. No successful imitation has yet been produced of this wonderful fur, nor will one ever be. Other pelts may be dyed to imitate, but such pelts must be classified for what they are—inferior imitations."

"A furrier would tell you that a real silver fox pelt was one showing no red or rust tinge; a fox showing pure blue black hairs and clear-colored silver-banded hairs. Silver fox is the trade name of the pelt or animal, though it may be all black in color."

"From the time that the adventurers trading in the Hudson Bay and France the pelt of the silver fox has held a premier position. It is said that some of the first silver foxes taken to France were tipped with gold by furriers before they were presented to the King in Russia. England and Germany silver fox was the fur of royalty in conjunction with ermine."

"About thirty-seven years ago a Prince Edward Island man began experimenting with silver foxes which he had dug from a hole in the woods. He knew of the great demand and the high prices existing for these pelts and that if he were successful in being able to domesticate and raise them he could make a fortune. His first efforts resulted in failure, but perseverance with other animals finally brought success in a manner he had never dreamed of. Other experiments joined him and they formed what is still spoken of as 'The Big Six Monopoly.' These men were Charles Dalton, Robert Tullin, J. S. Gordon, Robert Tullin, B. I. and Charles Rayner."

"For several years the industry of raising silver foxes was a closely guarded secret. Each season the poorer ones were killed out and their pelts shipped to the London fur markets, where they brought enormous prices, occasionally such great wealth naturally caused the neighbors to become curious, and finally one member of the combine sold a pair of foxes to his neighbor. As the news of the industry spread, the enthusiasm of the very conservative people was unquenchable, and they all demanded to get into the business. Prince Edward Islanders who had for years been scattered in all parts of North America rushed home to join in this new bonanza."

"Financial promoters became interested in forming companies and is the breeding stock for sale became scarce prices soared sky-high, as much as $35,000 being paid for a single pair of animals. Red foxes were bred black and sold as genuine animal; silver and cross foxes of a poor quality were imported from Quebec and the Northwest territories; options were taken on unborn puppies at a thousand dollars a litter—anything to get a financial interest in the wonderful new industry. During these days fox farming was more than a craze and a business; it was a religion. Poor men were made fabulously rich over night, and others were made poor in the same length of time; the same tide that carried in wealth for some carried away on its ebb the years of hard earnings of some of the conservative farmers. In later years the Island was considered as of two classes; those who made money in the silver fox business and those who did not."

"Nevertheless the fox industry was the symbol of wealth and progress, even under these adverse conditions. Great finance, until war clouds loomed on the horizon, when the bubble burst and fox speculation came to its natural end, as do all booms. For a period of ten years visited the Islanders who were engaged in the fox industry and many of the firms which had been highly capitalized failed. But the war served to put the business of raising foxes on a stable basis, converting it into a sound stock-raising proposition."

"Today there are in Canada upwards of 1200 fox farms with foxes valued at approximately $7,000,000. Of these farms 448 are situated in Prince Edward Island, Ontario being second with 201, the balance being scattered throughout all the 'true provinces' of the Dominion. Prince Edward Island last year produced a revenue of over $3,000,000 from the sale of pelts and live animals. Wiseacres have repeatedly said that each year as the num-

A GOODIE PYE

Take small chickens, break their legs and breast bones. Make of pastry the best. Then lay the chickens side by side on the saucer after filling their bellies full of breadcrumbs mixed with fresh butter, parsley, thyme, pepper and salt, wrap the pastry over them, wetting and moulding the edges together. Serve in a deep oval dish, and hand round this egg and wine sauce in a double boiler. Be sure to stir constantly, and be careful not to add more than a drop or two of rosewater, and one knot of sugar, and a tiny pinch of cinnamon. Sharpen with the vinegar and flavor to taste with the wine. The farmer the raising of different fur-bearing animals offers a profit that can not be equalled with cattle or hogs; to the professional man it offers the same profit and a fascinating hobby; to any person it offers alluring remuneration, a delightful study and a safe investment."

"The raising of silver foxes is now an established industry not only in Canada but in the United States and European countries as well. The Canadian Government has added to their records department a record system for the registration of silver foxes, and all high-grade livestock. People who make a study of fur conditions state that silver fox pelts will always bring a good price because the demand for these wonderful pelts is unlimited. Prices will no doubt fluctuate as they have done in the past, but silver fox pelts will always bring a price that will pay handsomely for their care and attention in raising."

"The wonderful profits that have been derived from raising silver foxes and the growing scarcity of different kinds of fur-bearing animals generally have led to experiments being made in the raising of such animals as mink, muskrat, fisher, marten, karakule sheep, skunk, beaver and others, and we have today quite a number of ranchers engaged in raising these more common animals. Perhaps the first in importance is the muskrat. Millions of these little animals have been trapped year after year and yet the pelts always bring a good price. Last season on nearly 4,000,000 of them taken the average price was $1.32 each. If muskrat furs were valued by their warmth and durability they would be very valuable; as it is, their low price is a result of their prolific breeding qualities and the large number taken each season. A single pair of muskrats will produce as many as fifty young in a season."

"The population of the world is continually increasing, the uses of furs are becoming more varied and the wearers more plentiful; while the wilderness, the natural home of the wild fur-bearing animals, is being replaced, first by farms, then by towns, and finally converted into big cities, with the natural result that unless they are raised under domestic or semi-domestic conditions, certain species will be exterminated in a comparatively short time."

"However, we predict that within the next ten or fifteen years the raising of different fur-bearing animals will be no more uncommon to the farmer, particularly the raiser of fine grade stock, than the raising of pure bred stock is today. To current New Leader."

Man Thought Dead Returns To Home

WINNIPEG, Dec. 4.—Unheard of for years and legally declared dead, Richard Inkster, alive and well, returned to Winnipeg today and reported that he had been locked up in the icy wilds of Northern Alaska. Mr. Justice Curran on May 7, declared Inkster legally dead, and affidavits were presented showing the missing man had not been heard of for years and that letters sent out remained unanswered. All agreed that he was dead. When he made the order, however, the judge expressed some misgivings. "The Inksters are a hardy breed," he said. "I know them all, and they don't die easily. I wouldn't be surprised if he showed up later."

Mr. Inkster is one of those who took part in the rush to the Yukon and is well known. He is a nephew of Sheriff Colin Inkster.

G. B. Shaw Resumes Assault On Reds

LONDON, Dec. 4.—George Bernard Shaw is again at his old pastime of advising the Communists how to run Soviet Russia. This time he has selected Gregory Zinoviev's Third International as the target of his adverse criticisms. The members of the Third International would find better employment writing movie scenarios or stories for young boys, thinks Shaw, than at their present work. As one of those who contributed toward the bail of the dozen British Communists who were recently convicted in Bow Street Court, Shaw protests against the Third International, because the convictions, he says, were the result of its "silly adherence to the convicted Communists who can not be trusted," writes Shaw in the

VEGETABLES TO COOK DANDELIONS

(A Dish for Good Health.) Victoria, 1835. Wash some dandelions, boil some salt and water, and while boiling put therein the dandelions. Cook till tender, take from the fire, and hold under running water to prevent the dandelions becoming too yellow and bitter. Then put into a pan a piece of butter, add a spoonful of flour and stock. Stir well till smooth and cooked, then add dandelions and season with salt and pepper to taste. Cook for 12 minutes longer, stirring well.

ENDIVE

4 or 5 heads of endive, 3 wineglasses of cream, 2 lumps of sugar, 2 large pieces of butter, 2 dessertspoons of white sauce. A little salt.

Wash the endive, remove roots and pick off outer leaves, preserving only the white portions. Put these in a saucepan of boiling salted water, and boil quickly without the lid till tender. Then drain well in a colander, squeeze dry, chop finely, and rub through a coarse hair sieve into a stewpan. Add the butter, salt, and stir over a slow fire for a few moments before mixing in the white sauce and cream, also sugar. Stir pure over fire till thick enough to pile up on a hot vegetable dish. Garnish with snippets of toast.
