CHAPTER XXVI—Continued
In a moment he had picked me up and was making off. The jolt of his step seemed to be breaking my arms at the shoulder. As I groaned he ran. I could see nothing in the darkness, but he went ahead, never stopping, save for a moment now and then to rest. I wondered where he was taking me and what it all meant. I called again, "Who are you?" but he seemed not to hear me. "My God!" I whispered to myself. "This is no man—this is Death severing the soul from the body. The voice was that of the good God." Then I heard a man hailing near by.

CHAPTER XXVII
But now I have better things to write of, things that have some relish of good in them. I was very weak and low from loss of blood for days, and suddenly the tide turned. I had won recognition for distinguished gallantry, they told me. That day they took me to Washington. I lay three weeks there in the hospital. As soon as they heard of my misfortune at home Uncle Eb wrote he was coming to see me. I stopped him by a telegram, assuring him that I was nearly well and would be home shortly, when they let me out a fine day in mid-August. I was going home for a visit as soon as any man; but, in the horse talk of Faraway, I had a little "blemish" on the left shoulder. Uncle Eb was to meet me at the Jersey City depot. Before going I, with others who had been complimented for bravery, went to see the president. There were some twenty of us summoned to meet him that day. It was warm, and the great Lincoln sat in his shirt sleeves at a desk in the middle of his big office. He wore a pair of brown carpet slippers, the rolling collar and black stock now made so familiar in print. His hair was tumbled. He was writing hurriedly when we came in. He laid his pen away and turned to us without speaking. There was a care-worn look upon his solemn face.

"Mr. President," said the general, who had come with us, "here are some of the brave men of our army whom I have brought with me. I cannot think of it even now without thanking God for good women. I clung to her hand, clinging with the energy of one drowning, while I suffered the merciful torture of the probe, the knife and the needle. And when it was all over and the lan-
