(Canadian Press Staff Writer) LONDON, Aug. 5 (CP)—Plans for 5,682 square miles of national parks and a 2,000-mile "coastal path" around all England and Wales are before the British government.

These are the main recommendations of Sir Arthur Hobhouse's 10-man National Park Committee, set up in July, 1945, to work out a huge "peace-and-quiet" plan. A similar study was made early in Scotland.

Capital expenditure on the scheme for England and Wales is estimated at $9,250,000 ($37,000,000) over 10 years, and annual upkeep at 175,000. London parks alone cost $600,000 a year before the war.

Under the Hobhouse plan, 12 parks would be established in a three-year program—

First year—892 square miles in the scenic Lake district of Cumberland and Westmorland on the west coast near the Scottish border; 870 square miles in North Wales; 572 square miles in the Derbyshire Peak district within leafy reach of Manchester; and 392 square miles in Devonshire, on the Somerset coast, including Dartmoor Forest.

Second year—635 square miles in the Yorkshire Dales; 239 square miles along the jutting coast of Pembrokeshire in South Wales; 318 square miles in Exmoor, on the Somerset coast, including Bristol Channel; and 275 square miles stretching along the South Downs close to the English Channel.

Including Roman Ruins
Third year—193 square miles on the wild moorland of Cumberland and Northumberland embracing the ruins of the Roman Hadrian's Wall; 614 square miles of North Yorkshire moors; 311 square miles in Central Wales—the Brecon Beacons and Black Mountains; and 181 square miles embracing the Norfolk Broads.

Fifty-two other regions would be designated "conservation areas," to ensure government control of land use. All told, one-quarter of the total of England and Wales would come under the plan.

"The parks themselves must not be stenciled as museum specimens," said the committee. "Farming and other industries must still be allowed to carry on."

They would be operated along the lines of such parks as Banff and Jasper in Canada.

The Hobhouse committee forecast the parks will be "a great national investment, yielding unlimited returns in health and happiness," and urged prompt government action.
