"I have no opinion. I cannot account for anything. All I know is that, at various stages, Binzel and readings of the metal remained constant. After the Lowood of 'em had been in various huddles of despair and the wheels were marked as steel so much as, well, cheese!"

"Sabotage?"

Moreton looked, sidelong, at the Security Officer.

"You know best what business brings you here."

Captain Callthrop grew restless and confused. He passed round cigarettes.

"About that — explosive."

"But that — explosive?"

"That's what Moreton was in complete command of himself. 'That's easily talked out.'"

He explained that, one night in August, a large lorry and its trailer was leaving his works as he arrived late. Lorry and trailer were loaded with completed tank gear boxes. The driver's mate had not settled himself in his seat — one of the two in the driving cab placed one on either side of the engine. The relief man had the door open, was standing on the running board, jacking with the driver, and he evidently used to cushion his seat. Something bright was flung from these seats. It tinkled and rolled across to Moreton's feet.

"It can best describe it," he said, "as a bigish cigar-shaped cylinder of something that looked like glass but wasn't. He became ironical and deliberate. 'Let us say a butted cylinder of some plastic or vitreous substance of spirit level's bubble-glass, on a large scale. And like that, it contains a liquid. Not an irritably which could rapidly blaze up into rage.'"

"Ratty" Helme would have suffered, woefully, at his hands, had it not been for Giles Moreton's curious intervention.

Carol heard from him a sudden snarl of whispered French; something about "pull up your horses, Callthrop, with a few added words" which her school-French just sufficed to let her know Moreton had warned the Security Officer that, "Slow and sure wins the race."

Callthrop was calmed. His irritation was altered into a half-exasperated half weary shrug as he subsided into his chair. Once again he left the initiative in Moreton's capable hands. Expansiveness, the gazet across at Helme.

"Hallo," Moreton sang out, cheerily, "come to let us in; time to get back to work. Ratty's time to a sudden flush. Battered by the address of his reception; realizing that his eavesdropping was ignored he became prudent.

"I'm not babbling about the likes of you," he snarled. "My business is with Captain Callthrop." "Yes? And what is it Helme?" "To Be Continued."

fluenced it, Moreton was horrified by what he saw.

"You recall an experiment in 'stinks' at school, Callthrop, where one mixed pulverized metal iodine with aluminum powder, then added a few drops of water?" Callthrop, eventually, nodded and smiled.

"Well, you'll also recollect that the mixture, peaceable until then, begins to fume and give off purple, smoke — and flashes of fire whizz, about in the report."

"That damned tube began to flash with light when the hot tea tickled it up, I so the jitter! So I picked the thing off my bench, went over to the open windows and switched it out. Lowood Tractor Works used to be a woollen mill. Like all the mills hereabouts it has a huge mill dam. And my tube went down, from the fourth floor, splash into that."

"But — but how can you say it contained explosives? Probably the stuff was only a —"

"Captain Callthrop; often I've watched rudd, 'ench and carp swimming about that mill pond. During the night there was a distinct thud right through this building. And, anyone will tell you this, a score of old fat fish lay floating, dead, on the water in the morning."

"This absolutely stumps me." Callthrop slowly said. "If simply can't reckon it up at all. Can you tell me what it was an August night? I said the lorry had just started. I said that the engine of that lorry divided the enclosed cab. The roads hereabouts are hilly."

"Yes — go on."

"After a while, especially with the engine labouring on these roads, pulling an enormous load, that cab would erupt into a petty inferno. Heat, I have explained, re-acted terribly on that mysterious tube of explosive fluid. So — draw you own conclusions."

"You are actually suggesting another form of sabotage, Moreton? An attempt to wreck a lorry load of tank gear boxes?"

"Not so very long ago," he murmured, "something strange happened to a lorry on one of these hills. For no apparent reason the driver blinded straight through the parapet of a viaduct. He and his mate were smashed to pieces — and their heads rolled."

With a sudden twist he opened the door.

"Ah, Mr Helme, isn't it? Do come in! As a matter of fact, I rather expected it would be you."

While, malevolent and unutterably confused, "Ratty" Helme was revealed in the doorway.

CHAPTER V

"I SEE IT ALL NOW"

Callthrop's natural reaction to the disclosure of Helme in the very act of eavesdropping was one of fury. Like many men who constantly grapple with things, necessitating close and accurate thinking, he had an irritability which could rapidly blaze up into rage.

"Ratty" Helme would have suffered, woefully, at his hands, had it not been for Giles Moreton's curious intervention.

Carol heard from him a sudden snarl of whispered French; something about "pull up your horses, Callthrop, with a few added words" which her school-French just sufficed to let her know Moreton had warned the Security Officer that, "Slow and sure wins the race."

Auld conducted the next part of the program, and Mrs. MacInnis the third part with prayers by Mrs. Albert Cudmore and Mrs. L. Cudmore. The Devotional Address was by Mrs. A. E. Todd. She commenced the splendid work done by the different societies through their working together. Never in the history of the world was Prayer, real Prayer so needed. We must begin in our own

It is only as the leaders of our government plan for the world after the war, with Christ as the foundation, that a lasting peace may be hoped for. Let us then as members of our various societies be more fervent in our Missionary enterprise, more faithful in Prayer and stronger in Faith. This was followed by a solo by Mrs. Earl Clark. What Will you do with Jesus Mrs. Auld had charge of the last part of the program, which closed with the King and Mizpah Benediction, after which a social hour was enjoyed. (Patrolist please copy)

A MESSAGE FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

To all Canadians:
Last year, over 29,000,000 lbs. of mail were despatched from the Post Office to our overseas letters are to the morale of our men and women away from home.

Yet due to carelessness or oversight in addressing, well over 250,000 letters for overseas had to be set aside last year for attention by the Rediretory Section of the Canadian Postal Corps.

This results in delay in delivery to those who are waiting for news from home. It imposes a heavy additional burden on the Postal staff in its great task of handling the greatly increased volume of mail under the handicap of manpower shortages from which it suffers in common with other Canadian businesses.

You can help your Post Office to speed the delivery of your mail to loved ones overseas. As your Postmaster General, I make a special appeal to you to take extra care in addressing your letters. To make sure that the address is complete in every detail.

If you will take an extra moment to make sure the address is right you will be helping us to give our overseas forces a better mail service.

Yours sincerely,
R. H. Mulock
Postmaster General.

DO THESE 3 SIMPLE THINGS

1. Make sure the address is clearly and correctly written.
2. Write a return address in the upper left hand corner of the envelope.
3. Affix the correct postage, and mail as early in the day as you can.
