ANEMIA

Did you ever wonder why a person who has had a haemorrhage complains of dizziness? One important function of the blood is to supply the tissues of the body. After a haemorrhage, the blood is diminished in volume, and fluid is withdrawn from the tissues to make up this deficiency. The tissues are thus deprived of fluids, so the system complains of thirst.

The sudden loss of comparatively large amounts of blood causes one form of anemia. Other anemias which occur are due, not to loss of blood, but to changes in the blood. Millions of red blood cells carry oxygen to the tissues. The average life of a red blood cell is a month. The body machinery is able to replace red blood cells at this rate. There is a reserve of red cells in the spleen and bone marrow sufficient to meet any sudden or unusual demand. If, however, the demand continues, the reserve is exhausted and the machinery for making new cells is unable to meet the demand, with the result that the quality or quantity, or both, of the red blood cells, but there is a change in the haemoglobin, with the result that the complex taken on a yellow-green tinge, hence the popular name "green sickness". This condition, which used to be common, is now comparatively rare in this country. The cause is unknown. It is readily cured by the administration of iron properly prescribed.

Ferrous anemia, or Addison's disease, is a type of anemia in which there is a tremendous decrease in the number of red blood cells. The onset of this disease is slow and gradual. The patient becomes aware of an increasing lack of energy. He finds that he fatigues easily and becomes breathless; he has no appetite and is occasionally dizzy. Numbness and tingling in the extremities are common. The skin is pale or yellow tinged, but there is no loss of fat.

A few years ago, it was discovered that the addition of liver to the diet of those suffering from pernicious anemia brought about a marked improvement and the blood became normal again. What substance is present in liver which does this is not known; it is found in extracts from the liver tissues and the tissues of other organs. This dietary remedy has brought about great advances in medical treatment for, through the use of liver, patients are brought back to normal. In Canada, however, the extracts are kept normal by the continuous use of liver.

Up until recently, pernicious anemia was usually fatal, but now the disease has been added to the list of those for which we have a specific remedy.
