SANDRA THE JEALOUS

By Jane Phelps
EVERETT TELLS SANDRA OF LEOLA

Chapter XX.
"Another proof of guilt" I thought as I realized the pictures were missing. "Why it was like a fiction story!" I was sure I never had read one quite like it. There ran through my mind even then that if I had to leave Everett, I would be ashamed to go home. Ashamed to face all the boys and girls who had known me all my life. What an awful thing for me. Only seventeen! And my life ruined.
Then such anguish went through me that I nearly fainted.
Dinner time came at last, and with it came Everett. He looked tired and talked but little. I thought dinner would never end. At last we were seated in the library before the fire with our coffee. I moved my chair so that I could look at him, and then when he was alone I asked without preamble:
"Who is the lovely woman whose pictures are in your bureau-drawers, Everett?" My voice trembled a little in spite of all I could do.
He gave a perceptible start.
"Who pictures? And what were you doing in my things?"
"Mother always tidies dad's chiffonier so I thought I would do the same with yours." I answered his last question first so that I might gain time to steady my voice a little. "The pictures were of a beautiful woman. On the back of one it said 'From Leola to Everett.' What an odd name, Leola," I repeated.
Something very like a groan broke from Everett.
"As well now as some other time," he said in a low voice, but I realized he was talking to himself; that he had not meant me to hear. I said nothing, but waited, every nerve in my body quivering with excitement.
"Sit over there." He pointed to a chair where he could look at me, but where it would be impossible for me to see his face.
Reluctantly I obeyed.
"I meant to tell you before. It is your right to know. But you were so young that I waited a while hoping you might become accustomed to me and so better able to understand what I am going to tell you."
He waited so long that I thought he had changed his mind, and stirred uneasily. I was all a-tremble with the wonder, the something akin to fear of what was coming; the story my husband was going to tell me.
He took from his pocket the two pictures I had mentioned. He looked at them, then opened a drawer in a little table at his elbow and laid them in it.
"Yes, Leola is an unusual name; and she was an unusual woman; she was my wife. We married when I was thirty, she was twenty-six. I was jealous. She was imprudent and would brook no restraint. We quarrelled constantly. Yet I loved her; his voice trailed off dreamily for a moment as if he had forgotten me, "and she loved me. But she was strong willed," his voice cold and calm again, "and so was I. Our fierce love-making was interrupted by fiercer quarrels always because of some indiscretion of hers, and because of my jealousy which she aroused. It was my fault, she was a brilliant woman. Society laughed at her indiscretions, calling them eccentricities. She knew this and it made her careless—careless of herself, and of me."
Again he waited what seemed an unconscionable time before he went on while I waited breathless, forgetting it was my husband who was talking, thinking only of the story he was telling me.
"Once day she met a man who seemed to attract her more even than others had done. I accused her, and she only laughed. My impression was confirmed when one day I found him making love to her. She was laughing, sure of her fascinations and careless that she hurt him, as she was indifferent to my anguish. That night we quarrelled worse than ever before. We both said cruel bitter things—I shall never cease to hear them yet, I know now. I knew then, that Leola was good and true. In my heart, I never doubted her."
Tomorrow—More about Leola.

The Leading Criminals.
It is taken for granted that Hindenburg, Ludendorff, Tirpitz, and Bethmann von Helldorf will be called. There can be no doubt that they had a certain responsibility for the conduct of the war, and perhaps for the events leading up to the invasion of Belgium. Another Cabinet Minister who is likely to be demanded by the Allies is von Capelle, who followed von Tirpitz as Minister of Marine. He played his part on the success of the submarine campaign, which was carried out with renewed vigor under his auspices. There will also be several submarine commanders summoned to the bar, and among them will certainly be von Forstner and Wilhelm Werner, both of whom were decorated by the Hohenzollern for some atrocious deed. Several of the submarine commanders, perhaps most of them, are no longer within the jurisdiction of any earthly court. Commander Max Valentiner is supposed to have commanded the U-boat which sank the Lusitania, but whether he is living is uncertain. This man, by the way, is the son of the Dean of the Sondersburg Cathedral, and was credited with having sunk no fewer than 128 vessels.

Mackensen the Merciless.
Mackensen, the man who did so much to break the heart of Russia, and who conquered Serbia and Roumania, is also to be extradited. He will be charged with the monstrous crimes which accompanied the invasion of Roumania in 1916, when the country was stripped of its necessities of life and hundreds of prisoners were executed. After the war he was interned in Hungary with his army for attempting to violate the terms of the armistice. He is now in the hands of the Allies, it is believed, and can be produced on a few days' notice. He and Hindenburg are the only holders of the Grand Cross of the Iron Cross, and it may be that his age will avail him if he may plead Hindenburg and Tirpitz from capital punishment. Another German general against whom a long score has been run up is Otto von Below, the most prominent item being the burning of Ardennes and the execution of one hundred people. Gen. Liman von Sanders, in command of the Turkish campaign in Mesopotamia, will be accused of ordering or sanctioning the massacres in Armenia and Syria. Baron Oscar von der Lancken is held partly accountable for the execution of Miss Edith Cavell and Captain Fryatt, for he was head of the German political department in Brussels, and it was to him that the appeals were made on behalf of these prisoners.

Cruel Treatment of Prisoners.
It will be remembered, that after the armistice von der Lancken was appointed, with Dr. Reith, who had been prominent in the German occupation of Belgium to confer with Mr. Hoover about food supplies for Germany, and that Mr. Hoover sent back the brief message that they could "go to hell," and that if he had to deal with Germans it would not be with that pair. Another commander who is to be held partly responsible for the murder of Miss Cavell is Baron Kurt von Manteuffel, military commander of Louvain. Gen. von Schroeder was the military officer immediately responsible for the shooting of Captain Fryatt. There will be several officers tried for brutalities to prisoners, among them Gen. Oisen and Gen. von Cassel, who were in charge at Doberitz. Lt. Rudiger was in charge of the British Major von Goetz at Madgeburg and the brothers Niemeyer at Holzminden and Clausthal. One of the latter was a German American and was particularly brutal to British prisoners.

Germans Who Must Answer For Crimes

Notice was given to Germany before the Peace treaty was signed that she would be required to surrender to the Allies some of her officers and statesmen for trial on charges of violating articles of war and of offenses against humanity. The most important of these is, of course, Wilhelm Hohenzollern, although it is not known that any names were mentioned to the German plenipotentiaries at the time. Nor have any names but his been officially mentioned since, although it is easy to guess some of them at least. For instance, the Crown Prince is sure to be asked to answer to his name in a London court. He might be charged with wholesale robbery and the rape of a countryside, or, as is more probable, with his responsibility for the war and the violation of treaties. Equally sure is it that the Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria will be put on trial. He was the strongest hater of the British among the German generals, and is reported in an official document to have ordered his men to take no British prisoners. He is held responsible for the execution of British prisoners that were taken by his army and was responsible for the deportation of the population of Lille, Turcoing and Roubaix.

Two Crown Princes.
Rupprecht was perhaps the best general, the most competent, if also the most ruthless soldier among the German royalties who fought or directed in the war. Between him and the Crown Prince of Prussia there appears to have been constant ill-feeling, and it has been reported that on more than one occasion when they held different views of military operations, Hindenburg preferred the judgment of Rupprecht. This is not surprising, since the Bavarian is a man ten years older than the Prussian, was a more serious-minded soldier, and on several occasions had to supply his young kinsman with reserves when the Prussians had got themselves into difficult positions. His character seems to have a streak of calculated cruelty which is not conspicuous in the character of the former heir to the German crown, who was rather immoral and callous than savage and vindictive. Therefore Rupprecht will be among the ex-royalties who may be expected to have the opportunity to show cause why the sentence of the court should not be carried out.

CHARLES A. BEATON.
A deep gloom was cast over Bonshaw and vicinity on the evening of June 24, when it was learned that Charles A. Beaton, youngest and dearly beloved son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Beaton, had been suddenly and unexpectedly called to the Great Beyond.
It will be remembered that Charles' death was the result of an accident, while unharnessing the horse after his day's work, the animal kicked

Rev. N. McLaughlan Criticises Resolution

ST. JOHN, July 22.—In the Portland street Methodist church Sunday, Rev. Neil McLaughlan spoke on the resolution passed by the New Brunswick Medical Society at its session last week. He took the view that the society in its resolution endeavored to throw discredit on the Prohibition Act and had furthered propaganda which would tend to destroy it. He took each section of the resolution separately and either sought to show that the statements were incorrect or as in some instances, they urged legislation which had already been passed.
The statement that alcohol was required for medicine and that it was being unnecessarily restricted, the preacher took exception to. He said that alcohol was under no more restriction than arsenic, strychnine or prussic acid and these statements only resulted in discredit being thrown upon the prohibitory measure. In reference to the control of the price, why should the doctors try to bring legislation to pass concerning fixing a moderate price for alcohol when the price of wheat, milk, meat and other things as well were not restricted, asked the preacher. In any case, the government has already taken action in this respect, said Mr. McLaughlan, and such a resolution is out of date.
He said, in reference to the violation of the Act by some doctors, that more than one physician in this city has been charged with selling liquor by the bottle and even offering to sell it by the case; they were brought into court and fined, the facts were known broadcast and the medical council had not taken action in those cases.

In view of the fact that there are several doctors who have violated this Act it is necessary that restrictions be placed on all. Let the medical society eliminate from its ranks those who lowered themselves to be boot-leggers and it may become safe to remove all restrictions; until then restrictions must remain. We agree with the society in regard to control of extracts and patent medicines, but do not agree with them that only an infinitesimal part of drunkenness is caused by doctors' prescriptions.

Rev. Neil McLaughlan is a native of West River, P. E. Island, and is a brother of Mr. John McLaughlan, of Charlottetown, and of Dr. R. D. McLaughlan, formerly of this city.
