THE MORNING GUARDIAN

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 17, 1893.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Sir Charles Tupper in his speech at Sydney the other day happening to speak of China, playfully added "cracked China, I fear it may soon be broken China." Whereupon a caller at the editorial sanctum of the GUARDIAN added, "what wonder, with John Bull in the China shop?" Thus Sir Charles, like Falstaff, is not only witty himself but is the cause of wit in others.

Either tipping is said to have taken the place of spirituous intoxicants in the northern and western parts of Ireland. The exhilaration is said to be far more pleasurable than that produced by alcohol and much more pernicious. It is not the ether of commerce that is used, however, but a compound known as anodyne drops. The vice is said to be an importation from Russia.

The question has been asked, but not yet satisfactorily answered, Why cannot the post office department either by its money order or postal note systems transmit money in sums from $20 upwards as cheaply as the express companies do? The postal system ought to have, and would have nearly all of this business outside of what is done through the banks, if it would do the work as cheaply as its competitors. It would be more convenient to persons transmitting money in most cases, but the lower rates are largely diverting the business to the express companies, whose money order system is a model of convenience and security.

An intimation in the press that the ex-empress Eugenie is seriously ill serves to recall the fact that this most unfortunate, but almost forgotten royal personage is still in the land of the living. Thirty years ago she was the most conspicuous and most admired of her sex, exalted in state, an empress in grace and beauty, as well as in power and her word was law in the fashionable world. Now the empire, her emperor husband and her son, sole hope of the dynasty, are all gone, and she herself covered under a cloud of defeat and humiliation. She may regret as she surveys the sorrowful story of the past quarter century, that she ever consented to be raised from comparative obscurity to the height of grandeur from which she was destined to fall so quickly and irrecoverably.

Montreal Witness objects that notwithstanding the preferential tariff the duties on cotton goods are still too high. It points out that American cotton prints are much better suited to the taste of Canadian consumers than English prints, and that the former are still largely imported. Canadians like the patterns and styles of American printed goods far better than British goods, as was shown by the fact that last year, with a 12 1/2 per cent preference in favor of the latter, Canadian shirt and blouse manufacturers imported 75 per cent of American goods in these lines as against only 10 per cent of English. The Witness contends that even the 25 per cent preference now in vogue will not turn this trade, and argues that the effect of present conditions is to give Canadian manufacturers as much protection as under the late government, to the serious detriment of consumers.

Spain, now deprived of her colonies, has a public debt of two billions of dollars with an annual interest charge of $140,000,000. The interest alone will involve a tax of $7.75 per head on her eighteen millions of people.

More than half the umbrellas used in the United States are made in Philadelphia, the annual production there being valued at retail at about $14,000,000. There are altogether 500 umbrella factories in the Republic with a capital of over $5,000,000. They employ over 8,000 persons, mostly men.

One of the interpreters of phophecy as recorded in the book of Revelation finds the punishment of Spain therein described as the pouring out of the fifth vial upon the seat of the Beast. Next in order, he says, will come the pouring out of the sixth vial on the river Euphrates, by which he understands the destruction of Turkey. After that the seventh and last vial will be poured into the air. Then, and not till then will there be a general war. So runs the interpretation which will probably be found quite as correct at many that have been offered within the past fifty years, and all of which failed to materialise.

Naval critics say that Cervera in his escape from Santiago adopted the worst possible formation of his squadron. By coming out in column and stringing his vessels along in single line he gave the opportunity for every one of them to be attacked broadside on by the heavy guns of a greatly superior fleet. The critics contend that once out of the harbor he should have formed his ships in line abreast with his torpedo boat destroyers in centre and to the rear, and thus made a dash against the centre of the blockading line. This would have brought on a quick engagement at close quarters, in which both the torpedoes and the ramming power of his ships could have been made effective while the American ships were under only half steam. In this way, though Cervera would have been beaten, he would have inflicted serious damage on his foes and not have made the inglorious ending he did.
