Cat Back After Fifty Million Years

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23 — A strange cat-size creature like no animal now living has come back after 50,000,000 years to help tell scientists how the mammal tribe to which man belongs got its start toward mastery of the earth.

Buried half a mile under the earth the skull of this ancient beast has been brought to the surface by an oil well drill in Caddo parish, Louisiana. In announcing the find the Smithsonian Institution said it is "one of the most remarkable discoveries in the history of vertebrate paleontology."

The skull, though small and insignificant in itself, brings long wanted knowledge of conditions on earth when drying up of the great swamps was spelling the doom of dinosaurs and giving mammals a chance to develop unhindered. Mammals are warm blooded, while the dinosaurs were reptiles and cold blooded.

The creature is important because scientists heretofore have known little about mammals in their early days. Most of the early mammals were so small and their bones so delicate that no trace of them can now be found.

This ancient ancestor of what is

Overshoe Glorified

CHICAGO, Nov. 25—Smart overshoes that women will wear without groaning and shuddering at the looks of the things are to be had this fall. These modern descendants of the old time galoshes that made even small feet look like bad attacks of the gout are designed to fit the feet and add chic to the costume as well as to give protection.

Among the new collections are sleek unwrinkled models fashioned of rubber along the lines of a modish leather shoe. One can even match alligator leather shoes in alligator grained rubber gaiters. Another model has caps, heel and is fashioned on the order of a shoe made of suede and embossed with lizard skin. Others are sleek and shiny.

But best of all from the feminine viewpoint, the new galoshes look small. They fit trimly about the ankle and over the instep. Some of them have a new concealed side-talon fastener. Others have snap fasteners or several buttons.

The smart colors this season are

Man's War They Said, But Let's Remember Part Women Played

Today There Are 2,643 Feminine Veterans Drawing Compensation For Disabilities Out Of 13,000 Who Served.

The following article will be of particular interest to relatives and friends on P. E. I. as Miss MacDonald referred to was born in North Bedeque and is a sister of Mrs. W. D. Gillis, Charlottetown.

It was known in the trenches as "this man's war." But when dawn of Armistice broke on a tired world fourteen years ago today approximately 13,000 women were enlisted under the American flag.

Yeomanettes, matrons, Army and Navy nurses—they wore a soldier's uniform and drew a soldier's pay. They bore a military rank which was sometimes as high as Major. And if you think that their service was limited to such genteel duties as taking temperatures far behind the lines or sitting at a desk in Washington you are vastly mistaken. There are 2,643 women World War veterans drawing compensation from the government today for disabilities incurred in the service, and 359 women died in the American uniform.

They Won Decorations Too

There were heroines in the women's ranks. The Distinguished Service Medal was pinned on the proud, khaki-clad chests of no less than thirty-two service women. The Distinguished Service Cross which is granted only for gallantry under fire, was awarded to four.

You do not win a D. S. C. because of the respectful chivalry of the officers or of a government eager to give a woman a break. You earn it by indomitable devotion to your post under the impact of a singing, searing pain, which may kill you or leave you crippled for life. You cannot stop your work long enough to find out which.

Of such stuff was Beatrice MacDonald made. A pretty young woman in a broad-brimmed service hat and lobe high uniform, she sailed as chief nurse of the Presbyterian Hospital unit, which left New York in 1916. Travelling over France by truck and train, the nurses found themselves creeping closer and closer to the front lines—those pathetic, shellfire lighted mud holes, from which stretcher-bearers started out on foot bearing the wounded.

Guns Bombard Wounded

On the night of April 17, 1917, the little chief nurse was hard at work with basin and bandages in an evacuation station immediately behind the lines, when a sinister crash rocked the world outside. Enemy airplanes were bombing the camp. Miss MacDonald was there to care for the wounded, and care for the wounded she did—while shells burst and cannons roared and the flashes of exploding bombs brought terror close to the white tents of the wounded. The little nurse tended her patients in the operating tent throughout the bombardment until a fragment of shell struck her face and gave her instant and lifelong blindness in one eye as a memento of the night. She was the first American nurse wounded and the first of the four women who won the Distinguished Service Cross.

Of what she is thinking today—fourteen years after the guns have ceased to roar across Europe? She is living quietly at home in E. 68th St.

The Blessing of Peace

"The world seems to be forgetting already the horrors of a war that some of our voters were too young to see," she said today as she turned her thoughts back to that first Armistice Day, when she was serving as chief nurse of the Evacuation Hospital No. 2—a post to which General Pershing appointed her after she had been wounded.

"No one who was in the fighting zone at that moment can ever forget the sense of blessed, solemn relief we all experienced at the words, 'Peace has come.'"

Not all of the survivors of our last conflict are up and about their cheerful, peaceful affairs today. Our government is paying compensation to 1,158 women veterans for permanent partial disability and to 456 for permanent total disability incurred in the service. One Army nurse, indeed, is drawing compensation for "permanent double total disability," which means the loss of eyesight and an arm or leg or of both arms or both legs. Forty-two women veterans are being cared for in Old Soldiers' Homes.

Twenty thousand war widows. Forty thousand Gold Star mothers. Thirty thousand women veterans, twenty-six hundred of them injured. Three hundred and fifty-nine women killed. That is how the war that ended fourteen years ago affected the women of these United States.
