Three For Egypt

By Violet M. Methley

"Go to sleep if you can and I'll feel highly flattered," Zenda said. "Perhaps if I read to you it would have the same effect; I've got a thoroughly silly novel here."

Half an hour later, Zenda left Kay sleeping soundly on the long cane lounge by the open window, and went slowly downstairs, smiling faintly. In her biscuit-coloured tussore suit, she looked even more washed-out than usual, but there was nothing colourless about the thoughts and plans which passed through her mind as she sat on the hotel veranda.

Certainly Sydney Lovelace would have been surprised if he could have known what was going on behind the pale blue eyes, which Zenda raised so meekly, as he approached and sat down beside her. "I've come to ask you for your help," he said. "There are so few women one feels one can trust."

CHANGE OF HEART

It was one thing, Kay found, to resolve upon rigid seclusion in her own room; quite another matter to carry out that resolution.

The outside world called to her in spite of blinds and shutters. It was hot and stuffy indoors, and her rather small room had no veranda and looked out upon a sun-trap of a courtyard with dazzling white walls.

Beyond those walls was Egypt with all its glamour, Egypt, which Kay, most probably would never see again. It seemed a terribly wasted opportunity.

She felt self-conscious too; the servants must think it queer that a perfectly healthy person imprisoned herself like this, even for meals. And Zenda's descriptions of walks and rides were most tantalizing.

Coming in one afternoon, dressed for riding, the elderly girl found Kay putting on her hat with a determined air.

"I'm going out for a bit," she said. "I must have some fresh air or I shall go mad."

"That's splendid and it's such a lovely evening," Zenda said. "I'd ask you to come with us to the Shirga Aasis, but it's a party from the hotel and—"

"Rafe is going with you, I suppose," Kay finished the sentence. "All the better. I shall be quite safe not to meet him, if I take the opposite direction."

"Yes turn to the right when you leave the garden. It is nice by the river. I do hope you'll enjoy yourself dear."

"Zenda," Kay's back was turned as she powdered her nose before the mirror. "Isn't it strange that we've heard nothing of Kit?"

"I shouldn't wonder if he went straight home in disgust. I'm beginning to believe that may be why he disappeared," Zenda answered slowly.

"Do you really think so?" Kay's voice sounded flat.

"What else could he do, really? He'd no money practically; just his return passage—he said so—and he was too proud to ask or accept any help. Besides . . . as I said before dear, he was very hurt and angry with you for not telling him where you'd gone, for making me promise to keep it a secret."

"He must have guessed why I did it, surely!"

"Well . . ." Zenda hesitated. "I'm sorry, Kay, but I always felt he might misunderstand, think that you had some other reason for not wanting to see him, that you'd . . . changed."

"If Kit could imagine that even for a moment, I'd never want to see him again!" Kay cried hotly.

This thought went with her out into the warm stillness of the late afternoon, lurked beside her as she walked along the river-bank, through scenes which reminded her of the coloured illustrations in an Old Testament picture-book.

But the exercise and the novelty of everything soothed Kay in spite of herself. She felt almost happy as she returned slowly towards the hotel, a couple of hours later, under the canopy of a gorgeous sunset intending to slip in through a side-door and avoid the lounge with its crowd of before-dinner cocktail-drinkers.

She had reached the garden and was sauntering along a path bordered by tamarisk bushes, grey-green and pink reluctant to go indoors and leave it all when a step sounded behind her.

Kay turned and saw Sydney Lovelace.

As she made a quick movement his voice arrested her.

"Kay, don't run away like that, don't treat me as if I had the plague. If you only knew how it hurts."

"You can't blame me for not wanting to see you, it's your own fault."

"That doesn't make it any easier. You took me so by surprise the other night. I hardly knew what I was saying. Don't think too badly of me. You're so much lovelier than I remembered; can you wonder if I was jealous when you spoke of another man?"

His voice was gentle and sad. He did not even try to come nearer, and Kay felt a sudden pang of something like pity.

"I'd try to forget what you said," she told him gravely. "I—"
