 THANKFUL
 The temperature moved up a peg. Yet this relief is sweet: We do not have to humbly beg Our janitor for heat.

"Do you believe that old saying that marriage is a lottery?"
 "I should say not. I once drew thirty dollars in a lottery."

Mothers: Why, I even saw him kissing you.
 Helen: But, mamma, I told him to stop.
 Mother: You did?
 Helen: Yes, every time.

"What became of Swatun who used to play on this team?"
 "He married, settled down and is the father of twins."
 "I see; has a bawl team of his own."

The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story
 By Augustus Mah

Continued
 "Then Seymore appeared; it was evident he was Smith's lieutenant. For some months this Seymore had been no friend to me. At first, of course, he had made himself pleasant—he even looked like becoming an intimate friend, for he has a way with him—and in a weak moment I had given him money to invest. He told me later it was all lost and more, but he kept smiling and promised to recoup me. He said he was wealthy. Spoke of marrying my little girl. Soon I began to see that he could ruin me with a snap of his fingers! But I kept that bitter pill to myself, and hoped for the best. And now, when he appeared with Smith, I understood the truth about him. I saw why he had got me under his thumb! He knew I was the old laird's best friend, and Seymore wanted to be able to shut my mouth in case I discovered more than was good for them!
 "I think I saw everything clearly, as these two ruthless fiends sat opposite me—everything, that is, except what had been going on here at Black Edge. You perhaps know more about that than I do."
 "It's just this," I said briefly. "Smith's real name is Geldart. He's been running cargoes of machine guns and airplane parts to Germany. And the old laird, I am sorry to say, gave him—or was forced to give him—Black Edge as a secret depot."
 "Is it possible that my old friend was drawn into—"

I shrugged my shoulders. "I'm sorry it's true. You've said he bitterly regretted it. Geldart wanted to lay hands on these stones—the laird's own share of some Balkan expedition, perhaps of that very voyage you mentioned a year ago."
 Mr. Shaw's head was in his hands. "My poor old friend! My poor old friend! Two cleverer rogues, I think, have never lived. I am not malicious, but it gives me great satisfaction to think they've had to fly without the booty they wanted to steal. I thank God they are gone, and that my little girl is safe, and you, Mr. Drysdale, and your London friend as well. And now I think I would like to go home."

When we reached Brackenbridge in George's car Marget declared that her father must go straight to bed. But he demurred.
 "Not till I have performed my duty, my dear! I will do anything you ask me after I have placed these stones in Mr. Drysdale's hands."
 "They're not mine," I said with a laugh. "The laird put them there for Marget—he meant her to have them."
 And I smiled quietly to myself, for I had a little idea that it didn't particularly matter who got them, Marget or I.

In his study Mr. Shaw opened a drawer in his desk and took out a key. "This is the key of the Laird's Room. The key for the kirk door is out in the hall. And now we're ready."
 Brackenbridge church stands back from the road among trees; and from the vestibule Mr. Shaw led the way up a narrow corkscrew stair. Pushing open a door, he awaited us on a little landing. The stair continued upward but on the left there was a heavy iron grille that filled an archway. Beyond this lay a book-lined room with a large square window of colored glass. "He couldn't have found a better hiding place," said Mr. Shaw, inserting the key. "Nobody ever came into this room except the laird and myself. In fact, this is the only key there is."
 The iron grille swung back, and we entered.

WORTH THOUSANDS
 "See there's the old pewter cupboard." Mr. Shaw pointed to a little panel with a keyhole and knob on it high in the wall. A small key hung innocently on a nail beside it.
 "And they thought he had concealed them in the Hall!" I exclaimed.

While all the time they were here, in the most innocent place in the world." Mr. Shaw nodded, stood on tiptoe, and lifted down from the cupboard a little wooden box with an inlaid pattern which looked like an ordinary trinket case. The minister carefully placed it on the table. The box was not even locked, for the lid opened at his touch.
 Marget bent over it and gave a cry of disappointment. The box contained a handful of rough stones.
 "Is this all?" she cried. "I expected at least to see something pretty!"
 I took a brief look at the stones.
 "My dear girl, these are uncut diamonds," I said. "You may be certain they're worth thousands, or Geldart wouldn't have virtually risked his life to lay hands on them!"
 "You may be certain of it," corroborated the minister.
 "You may be very certain of it," said a soft voice behind us.
 We turned with a gasp. And Geldart himself smiled on us from the open doorway.
 "Very certain of it," he repeated, chuckling because we were struck dumb.
 He gave us not a moment to recover. His right hand was in his side pocket, and the clothes juttied ominously. He quickly stepped into the room, snapped shut the box on the table, and slipped it into a pocket. Back in the doorway, he bowed and said in the most amiable way possible:
 "I am sorry, friend Drysdale, I liked you. You liked me. We would have got on well together. Unfortunately, our interests clashed. But before I go, I must clear up any doubts you may have that the girl Therese is not the fool she pretended to be. You see, when I leave a place, I hate false impressions to remain. She told you what she did on my instructions. It was all true, because you already knew too much for her lies to be convincing. You were also released on my orders." He smiled and bowed again.
 "Not because she was a fool."
 "At that I found my voice," I never thought she was a fool," I said steadily.

NASSAU, BAHAMAS A FAVORITE RESORT
 Last year only a thin trickle of guests came to enjoy the glorious summer months of May, June and July, but the enhanced series of such popular seagoing vessels—the "Lady" class of the Canadian National, the Munson liners Manargo, Munamar, and Contoy, is steadily making for a substantial increase. With available services from Montreal, New York, Bermuda and Miami, the summer tourist trade shows a development of a kind surpassing expectation. The Royal Victoria Hotel, a fashionable winter hostelry is remaining open the year round and its environs are nightly the scene of semi public and private entertaining. Paradise Beach over three miles long presents a gay appearance and the sun juniors from offices of executives who winter here deport themselves "where the boys did in December and January." Out island excursions for July and August have been given impetus by the fact that an English company is about to place on service a brand new passenger vessel with the most modern amenities for comfort and travel.
 It will journey to Hatcher Bay, Eleuthera where a land locked harbor and camp after the manner of the Canadian summer resort type can cater to families. Excellent beaches, roads and fishing abound, the island being nearly 100 miles long offers great variety of the Colony is one of optimism due to the anticipated summer season.

THE PROOF OF PAINT

WEARS LIKE IRON

Try out for yourself the Jap-a-lac Paint. By rubbing between finger and thumb, get the smooth feel of it; that is the proof of fine grinding of the base materials.

Smell it. The odour of pure linseed oil predominates. That is the proof of its purity.

Brush it out thoroughly, and notice how easily and well it covers the surface—that is the proof for weather resistance.

Jap-a-lac standards are high. For twenty-five years the name of Jap-a-lac has suggested Varnish Stains and Enamels of rare beauty, permanence, economy and ease of application.

Today your paint dealer stocks Jap-a-lac in more than fifty varieties. For every job around the place, delicate wall tinting as well as a jaunty coat of paint for the garage, or a touch-up for the buffet or chiffonier, there is now a Jap-a-lac exactly suited.

Use Jap-a-lac every where in the home, for health and happiness, for style and distinctive beauty. Protect your home with Jap-a-lac paints and finishes, which retain their gloss without cracking, blistering or peeling. All the new varieties are easy to apply; and the Glidden Company guarantees every can.
