CHAPTER XI
ROUSED AT DAWN

Perkins said a word under his breath. Disappointed as she was, Rose felt distinctly cheered.

Perkins wrapped up the salts and gave them to the boy, who banged out. But the magic moment was past. Too shy to attempt to recover it, Perkins went behind the counter. Rose noticed how his hand shook as he picked up the prescription, and again his agitation pleased her. He disappeared behind the screen, and some minutes passed before he came back with a small parcel neatly wrapped and sealed. As he shook hands, Rose paused a moment, hoping he might say something else. He wanted to —she saw that—but shyness overcame him. With a tiny sign she turned and went.

Edgar reached home in time to dress for dinner. He asked after his mother and Peggy told him what the doctor had said. Then he went to his mother's room.

When Peggy came down Mr. Meakin was already in the drawing room, and Edgar was soon with them.

He turnerd to Peggy. "Mother looks bad."

"She had a shock," Peggy replied, "but Dr. Arkwright assured me there is no need to be anxious. He is not coming again until tomorrow afternoon."

"I hope he is right," said Edgar with such unusual gravity that Peggy gave him a quick look. The chance in him was so great that she found it difficult to understand.

Edgar was very silent during dinner, but Peggy and Mr. Meakin chatted away. Peggy was a favourite with the old solicitor and she, for her part, liked him greatly.

Afterwards Peggy went up to relieve Rose, who had been sitting with Mrs. Trelawney, now revived and by no means pleased to hear from Peggy that the doctor had ordered a milk diet. Peggy herself made her a cup of patent food. Presently Edgar knocked and came in and his mother began to complain of being starved.

"May she have a glass of her wine?" Edgar asked Peggy and Peggy answered that she thought the doctor wouldn't mind. The wine was a Chablis of which Mrs. Trelawney was very fond, and there was a decanter in the room.

As it happened, it was empty and Edgar, instead of ringing, said that he would refill it himself. He went down and came back in a few minutes with the decanter refilled. He himself poured out a glass and gave it to his mother.

She asked him what he had been doing and he told her that he had taken Mrs. Jardine for a drive and had tea with her at her house. Again Peggy was struck by Edgar's kindness and consideration for his mother. Yet for the life of her she could not like him any better. The night of Chesham's death stuck in her memory. It seemed to her flatly impossible that a man who had shown such brutal selfishness Edgar had then displayed could possibly reform.

Presently he went down and Peggy made the invalid comfortable for the night. Then she opened the bottle of medicine, carefully measured out the dose, and added the water.

"A new prescription," she told the old lady. "Dr. Arkwright thinks it will do you good and help you to sleep." She gave the glass to Mrs. Trelawney, who took the medicine obediently.

"It's nasty," she said with a little shiver as she dropped back on her pillows.

Peggy recorked the bottle and put it on the bedside table next to the decanter. She washed out the medicine glass, then turned out the lights, leaving only the nightlight burning. After that she sat down in an easy chair. Mrs. Trelawney spoke.

"There is no need for you to wait, Peggy. I am quite comfortable." Such consideration was unusual and Peggy felt a little glow of gratitude.

"I'll just stay till you are asleep," she said quietly, "then I will go down and talk of Mr. Meakin."

Mrs. Trelawney was soon asleep and Peggy went down and had a chat with the lawyer. He told her he had drawn up the will and that it was properly signed and witnessed, and congratulated her on her legacy.

"The only snag is this, Peggy," he said, "that you have to stay with Mrs. Trelawney while she lives. That's a hard condition. A girl like you ought to marry and have a family." She raised her head.

"It's only natural that Mrs. Trelawney should wish me to stay with her, Mr Meakin. It would be difficult for her to train anyone else to run the house. But frankly, I shall be very glad to have this money." Mr. Meakin nodded.

"I take it you've guessed something, Peggy. You have not much opportunity to spend money here."

"Very little," Peggy confessed. "I have to help my sister. She was left badly off."

"Surely she got compensation for the death of her husband."

"She got three thousand pounds, but that is only about £120 a year."

"It was a lump sum. She could have started in business of some sort." Peggy shook her head.

"Isobel is no good at anything of that kind. I'm glad to be able to help her."

The lawyer remained silent. He knew much more about Isobel Cayley than he had admitted. He classed her as a selfish, pleasure-loving person of the same type as Edgar but would not say for fear of hurting Peggy. He was really fond of Peggy and had already made up his mind that she was just the wife for John Arkwright. He had known of him for a long time past, for Arkwright was a particular friend of his own son, Gerald, a doctor-barrister who was already well known as a Home Office expert.

Presently Peggy got up and said good night.

Before she retired, Peggy went into Mrs. Trelawney's room. She was sound asleep so Peggy went peacefully to bed. Tired from her long day, she slept at once and did not move until roused by someone shaking her awake. Rose was bending over her and Rose's face was white and frightened.

"The mistress, Miss Peggy! She looks terrible. I'm afraid she's very ill."

In Memoriam

MALCOLM MacKENZIE

There passed away at his home in Brooklyn, Lot 61, on Thursday, September 11th, 1941, Malcolm MacKenzie aged 77 years. He was born in Milltown in 1864, several years after his parents had come from the Isle of Skye, Scotland. Although he had been in failing health for some years, his death came as a comparative shock to his relatives and friends. Having lived in the vicinity of his old home nearly all his life, he will be missed by many. He was a member of Valleyfield United church for many years, but was not able to take an active part for several years.

The funeral took place from his home on Saturday, September 13 h, Rev. T. Owen Hughes of Cardigan Presbyterian church having charge of the service. Hymns sung were The Lord is My Shepherd, Abide With Me and Safe in the Arms of Jesus. Will the Circle be Unbroken was very nicely sung by John Bears and Willard Bruce.

Besides his widow, he leaves two sisters, Jane Mrs. MacDonald, Breadalbane and Bella, Wayland, Mass., U. S. A.; also four stepchildren, George Bears, Belle River; Catherine, Mrs. Stirling Corbett, South Granville; Mary, Mrs. John Bears, Brooklyn; and Louise, Mrs. Norman MacMillan, Alberry Plains. The pallbearers were Willard Bruce, Jack MacKinnon, Archie MacDonald, Alexander Matheson, Duncan Bruce and Neil Bruce.

Interment was in Valleyfield cemetery.

His name was MacDuff
And he felt very gruff,
But it wasn't his liver
Or his Model T flivver
That caused him to huff
and to puff!

It seems he went buying,
Spent all his time trying
To keep from losing his roll—
But the story is sad—
He spent all he had—
And landed himself in the hole!

But the Guardian came to the rescue—
With bargains worth looking into,
So the ending is gay
We're happy to say,
And MacDuff no longer gets gruff!

Mother, This Home-Mixed Cough Relief Is Splendid

Saves Real Money. No Cooking. Real Results.

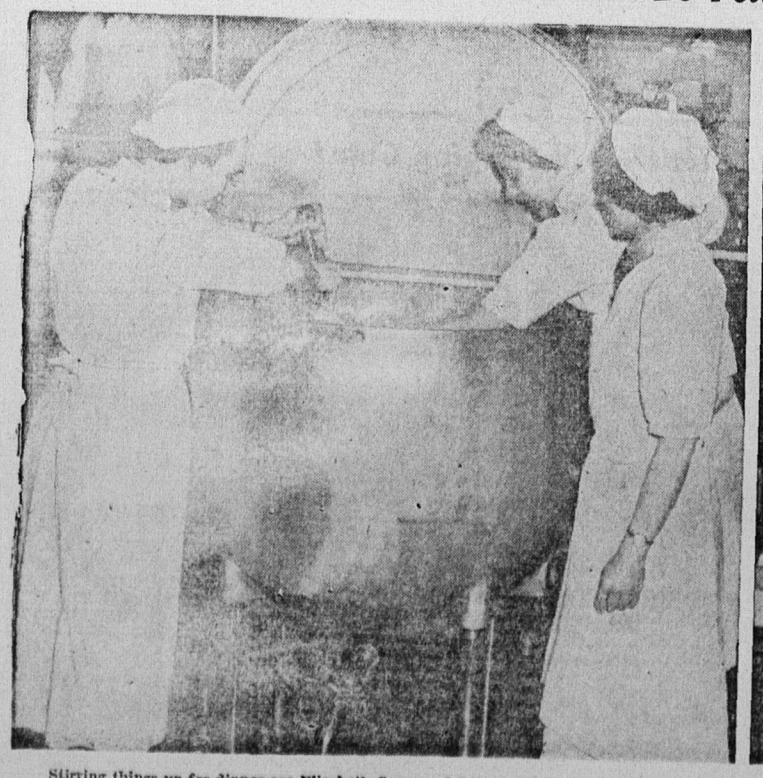
To get really surprising relief from coughs due to colds, you can easily prepare a medicine, right in your own kitchen. It's very easy—anyone can do it—needs no cooking, and tastes so good that children take it willingly. But you'll say it's hard to beat, for quick results.

First, make a syrup by stirring 2 cups of granulated sugar and one cup of water a few moments, until dissolved. Then get 2½ ounces of Pinex from any druggist, and pour it into a 16 ounce bottle. Then add your syrup. This gives you 16 ounces of really splendid cough syrup—about 4 times as much for your money. It never spoils, and lasts a family a long time.

And for real, quick relief, it is actually splendid. It works in three ways—loosens the phlegm, soothes the irritated membranes, and helps clear the air passages.

Pinex is a special compound of proven ingredients, in concentrated form, well known for prompt action in coughs and bronchial irritations. Money refunded if it doesn't please you in every way.

Woman's Touch Will Be Felt in R.C.A.F. Kitchen As First Class of Service Cooks Graduate



Stirring things up for dinner are Elizabeth Savage of Ottawa, Violet Watts of Woodbridge, and Isabel Philip, Lucknow. For practice in preparing army rations in large quantities, they've been getting meals for R.C.A.F. men at No. 4 wireless training school in Guleph.

Sisters from Calgary, Mary and Yvonne Cunningham, bestow a completed jelly roll on a tray for the airmen's table. The graduates, comprising the first women to cook for Canada's armed services, are now dispersed. Some are at Uplands station, Ottawa, others report to the depot in Toronto

Let 'em eat cake—and if these are samples, the boys are going to like it. Stella Herman, of Edmonton, and Winnifred Kenyon, Brantford, display decorative products of their art at the R.C.A.F. cookery school in Guelph, which graduated the first class of airwomen for active duty.
