The Third Warning A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Mahr

George's words were paralyzing. I stood there, the curtain clutched in my hand unable to utter a sound or make a movement, my brain frozen and useless. I don't suppose, looking back on it, that more than a few seconds passed during this state of numbered impotence; but at the moment it seemed like a ghastly eternity—as if time were a tangible thing, a thin, fine-drawn thread of agony. I wondered afterward whether, in the seemingly stupid bout of panic I had suffered ten minutes before, there had not been some presentiment of this news that now gripped and held me as if I were a being without volition. With an exclamation of impatience George stooped swiftly to my feet and snatched up and extinguished the electric lamp. In the sudden beneficent darkness my faculties awoke. Somehow this darkness gave security. Half my horror during these few desperate seconds was concentrated or the mental picture of a dark figure swiftly crossing the lawn, while here on the floor was this white evil light, this pallid telltale beam of light I was somehow powerless to quench. But now I breathed again.

"We're trapped," said George shortly. I realized at once the truth of his remark, for the doors into the passage from both bedroom and sitting room were locked and keyless. Then I had a burst of hope. "Couldn't we get out of this window?"

"Got bars outside," muttered George. "I looked when we came in first."

I stepped quickly across the room in the vague hope he might have been mistaken. When my hand was on the curtain George drew me up short.

"Don't look!" he snapped at me. "You might give us clean away. Great Scott! The blighter might be around trying to have a squint in that window this mortal moment."

"He'll be in any time," I grasped. "No, he won't," said George, "unless he comes in through the house. I've closed down the sitting-room window and fastened it. It was the only thing to do. I had no time to warn you and get up clear. Luckily I heard the gate creak. It just creaked, once, but that was enough for me. I was off the lawn and into that room like a streak of greased lightning. Then I heard a pebble on the path. I had hardly got the window shut when I saw him on the lawn."

TENSE SUSPENSE

"Who is it? Could you see?" "Too dark," grunted George. "Perhaps some village bobby on his rounds. More likely some pal of Seymour's who's paid to keep his eye on things." "If it's Seymour himself," I said quickly, "he'll be coming in the front door and meantime we could scuttle by the window."

"Hold on!" said George. "Keep dead quiet and I'll see what's happening." He stole from my side. "I'm having a look through into the sitting room," came his whisper in a moment. "He's there at the window with an electric torch."

I felt forward till my hand touched George's shoulder. We held the door nearly closed, and looking through the tiny gap I could see a dim glow of light at the window.

"What's he going to do?" I queried. "He's had a good look at the room with that torch of his. I can't make out what his game is."

"He seems to be having a squint at the catch."

"You're right," said George. "I believe he's coming through that window after all. Well he'll have the same job I had to get in."

"What can we do?" I groaned. "Have we to stand here and wait for this blighter, whoever he is, to come in and oop us? Can't we do something about it?"

"No," said George abruptly. "Let low just now. If he runs into us, well whoever gets the first swipe wins. But I'm desperately curious to know what he wants in here. If it's Seymour why the blazes is he housebreaking into his own place?"

"Did you hear that?" I whispered, gripping my companion's arm. "That was the catch!"

"I heard it," said George tersely. "Back in here! He should be inside in half a second."

We slipped into the middle of the room. I was still clutching his arm, and he led me across to the window. "Get behind these curtains," he whispered; "it's safest there. One at each side, up against the wall. I'd rather be standing upright on my pins if I've got to swipe anybody! Are you all right?"

"Right as rain," I muttered, but did not feel it. My own instinct would have been to select a less obvious hiding place, but as the moments passed I realized the wisdom of George's judgment. It was just about the only hiding place! Even if the intruders parted the curtain and looked out of the window he wouldn't see us; the stuff that concealed us was thick and heavy; we were right out of the window alcove, standing close against the wall, one on each side; and unless we made a move and gave away our presence to prod the curtains was the only way to discover us. That he was an ordinary burglar I began to be morally certain for there was no sound from the next room, and the opening of the window and his movements must have been performed with professional skill. Then the tail of my eye caught a white glare of light on the wall where the folds of the curtain hung.

TERCENTENARY TABLET AT NASSAU BAHAMAS

With the pomp and pageantry of the Imperial fabric, brilliant uniforms, the peremonial of the guard of honour and the crash of music, men and women drawn from the West Indian Colonial possessions of Great Britain saw the Tercentenary tablet of the founding of this Colony and the Bicentenary tablet commemorating the establishing of parliamentary government unveiled by His Excellency Sir Charles Orr, K. C. M. G. Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Bahamas. These two tablets placed on the walls of the House of Assembly commemorate the first Royal Grant of the Island to Sir Robert Heath, Attorney General of England in 1629, and the first meeting two hundred years ago of the Bahamas Legislature.

The tablets, which are enduring monuments to the foundation of the Bahamas as a British Colony and the incorporation of the local Bahamian Parliament, occupy a prominent position on either side of the East Door of the Chamber of the Lower House.

Wearing the picturesque uniform and plumed cocked hat which are the insignia of a Colonial Governor, Sir Charles Orr, was the central figure in an historic ceremony conducted with all the ancient ritual with which official functions are performed in the older British Colonies.

Precisely at 12.15 p. m. His Excellency arrived at the Bay Street entrance to Parliament Square and as the Police Band played the National Anthem he inspected the Bahamas Police Force. The sun gleamed from a hundred bayonets as the Governor walked down the lines of the little army, gaily uniformed in white tunics and red-striped trousers.

Immediately after the inspection His Excellency was met by the Hon. William Miller, I. B. O. Acting President of the Legislative Council and the Hon. Harcourt Malcolm, O. B. E., K. C., Speaker of the House of Assembly, who conducted him to the dais. Other high officials present were Sir Kenneth Beatty, K. C. Chief Justice of the Bahamas, the Hon. Chas. Dundas, O. B. E., Colonial Secretary and the Hon. N. S. Solomon, Receiver General and Treasurer of the Colony. The Hon. A. W. Bluck, O. B. E. the speaker of the House of Assembly of Bermuda, the older sister-Colony of the Bahamas was an interested spectator of the proceedings. The Acting President of the Council and the Speaker of the House both made eloquent speeches and then after an outstanding oration in which he expressed the hope that Bahamians of the present day would not fail to maintain the Colony's enviable record of constitutional government the Governor with a single movement unveiled both tablets, thus closing a unique event in the history of the Bahamas.

Here is the Recipe Filing Cabinet You wrote me about

If you are one of my many friends and pupils who have written me to ask how I keep my recipes—I have wonderful news for you.

Through the courtesy of the Maple Leaf Milling Company I can now offer you an exact duplicate of my own recipe filing system for only 25c.—which is less than it actually costs to make it up.

In each of these Filing Cabinets, carefully classified under the index cards, shown in the picture above, I have included over 100 of my newest and choicest recipes! Each recipe is plainly and briefly worded. Blank cards too are included for pasting up other recipes. (The cabinets can be had in either English or French.)

This cabinet will be a wonderful help to you—it will simplify your cooking and baking—it will keep your favorite recipes safely filed, always easy to find and handy to lift out and keep in front of you when baking.

When you bake next time, try Maple Leaf Flour. Housewives throughout Canada tell me that through its use they can improve their baking to an amazing degree... lighter, tastier bread, flakier biscuits and truly delectable cakes and pastries. It is made from the best grade of Canadian Hard Wheat and every bag carries a money back guarantee of satisfaction.

In each bag of Maple Leaf Flour there is a new "Anna Lee Scott" recipe printed on a filing card, in both French and English. Try Maple Leaf Flour—and be sure to get your Recipe Filing Cabinet at your earliest opportunity.
