And I've tried ever since. I've fought against it, against Camilla. Truly I have. If you'd only try to understand, if you'd only give me time enough, I'm sure I could make you see how it was, make you not blame me too much. Understand. Anne ran up the walk, stumbled over the steps, turned at the door, her back against it as if bracing herself. Yet, at the same time her hand was fumbling, twisting the knob, opening it. "I'm sure you could," she said. "There's no doubt about it, David. None at all. Only you see—and this time you must be the one to understand—there isn't time now. There never will be time enough. Please, David, you've said enough, explained, you have made me understand. "I have!" David gasped. He wiped his perspiring brow with the back of one hand, fought for breath again. Relief welled up in him, and that self-justification so great that it was almost overbalancing. He made a lurch for her, reached out. Anne was astonished that she looked just the same. She would stare at herself in her mirror, not believing that her outward appearance had not changed. Her grey eyes were just as direct and honest, though they might seem larger, due to the sooty smudges from lying awake all night, and night staring into the darkness; her nose was the same too, small and straight; her mouth curved and red; her chin dimpled, yet determined. Anne knew what her mother and Aunt Susie and all the family, and all her friends and maybe some who were not so friendly, were saying. They were saying the usual conventional thing, the most appropriate condolence, for Anne knew how people would talk and talk in a town like Oakdale. They were saying that Anne Ashton should be glad—glad, mind you! to have found out David Sherman in time. She was well rid of him. Why, just suppose they had been married and then the young man had turned out this wolf in sheep's clothing, a man who would ditch a girl practically at the altar—a girl who had been faithful and foolish enough to wait so many years—for someone younger and wealthier and richer who was able to catch his roving eye.
