QUESTIONNAIRE GIVEN TO BRITISH FAMILIES

LONDON, Sept. 23 — (CP) — As part of a survey of all British industries, "teams" from the Ministry of Information have been calling on farmers to fill in a 100-point questionnaire about themselves and their families. The survey aroused strong criticism among Sussex farmers, first in the agriculture industry to be polled.

Some of the questions are: What newspapers do you read? Do you bring magazines and newspapers to the notice of your workers? What sort of education are you giving your children?

Calling the survey a waste of time and money, officials of the National Farmers' Union here said "what good can it do to ask a farmer where his children go to school and what newspapers he reads?"

George Formby's Popular Hit

The broad humour of the North country is the material that will get the laughs from every cinnaburger, irrespective of county, in the A. B. F. D. picture "No Limit" current at the Prince Edward Theatre this week.

George Formby's comedy portrayal of a simple Lancashire lad is a delight that should definitely be witnessed. His drawing speech contrasts strongly with the fast moving and decisive scenes, many of which show actual sequences from the Isle of Man Tourist Trophy races.

Formby, a young chimney sweep's help, has ambitions to win a T. T. race. He gets the opportunity and in doing so meets with many and varied adventures. Florence Desmond is the feminine lead, bewitchingly charming as one of the boy's enthusiastic supporters.

Excellent cutting and direction have ensured a perfect mixture of thrills and comedy. The story, written by Walter Greenwood, author of "Love on the Dole," lacks nothing in humour and provides two stars with perfect roles.

The race sequence at the end of the picture is a spectacular piece of filming. Crashes, skids, and innumerable accidents combine to give the picture an exciting flavour. Formby's antics, whilst "riding off" his opponents are the last word in high spirited fun and will not give the audience time enough to get their breaths for the thrilling ending.

The Prince Edward Island Hospital And Increasing Expenses

Our lady collectors are now getting their districts in hand ready to begin promptly, on October 1st, the Annual Collection. All contributions be they large or small will be thankfully received and published as heretofore.

One of the outstanding reasons why the annual collection for your Hospital needs to be materially larger this year than during the past few years is because of the large increase in the cost of supplies, which the Hospital has to buy. This year as every household knows, the cost of meats, butter, eggs, milk, bread and fruit are all very much higher than they have been in recent years.

Fortunately, the farmer and fisherman reap the benefit. They have had it pretty tough in recent years, and now will be able, and the Hospital feels sure will be willing, to help out more abundantly as prices get better for them but worse for the Hospital. The prices of general groceries, canned goods, medical supplies, etc., the tendency has been the same as with meats and other farm products. The Hospital carries on with its work of healing and does its very best for everybody. Increasing expenditures must be met by increasing revenues. The Annual collection affords the opportunity for everybody to share in the effort of helping the Hospital meet the increasing costs.

The mournful chiming of Big Ben came through, and the silence was tense.

Emily, seated next to the radio, studied the anguished faces about her. They were so expectant as children listening to a fairy tale come to life.

Frieda Hatterson, one of the shrewdest buyers in town, was about to burn her finger with a forgotten cigarette. Celeste, known for her own town in America, did not realize that she was chewing her lips. Patience Gardiner, who could swear more fluently than most men, had closed her eyes. Emily could feel Frances' tight hand on her shoulder, and she snickered inwardly.

In the silence after the introduction, Emily felt the same electric flow that came to the rest, and when that voice began, soft and controlled "At long last I am able to say a few words of my own," she was intent as any in the room. Once there was a falter in the speech, as if the emotion were too great to be borne, and Emily thought of the help and support of the woman I love," she heard and then, looking up, she saw that Frieda had begun to cry, openly and unashamedly.

There was a heavy silence when it was all over. Each was wrapped in her own world. They sat anxiously, it seemed, they grew aware of Frieda's continued sobbing. Patience started a remark, but her words were stony and garbled, and Emily saw that there were tears in Patience's eyes, too. She looked at quickly. Frances was dabbing her nose with a handkerchief. Celeste's face was stricken. And it was then, just as Emily looked at her, that her own own stoicism, that Emily was first aware that she, too, had cried. She sat there, stunned.

Frieda's voice was booming out. "Darneest, thing I ever heard! Imagine if you could get that sock into a story!"

The magic had flowered with her voice and in a short while the women were laughing at their tears, joking about them. But Emily seated alone in a corner, did not join their banter. She wished that they would leave. They seemed pretty thick talk tainted the air, their attitude tended to debase the miracle she had heard. She was happy when Frieda looked at her. "I'm glad you're here," she said. "Ye gods, I must dash!" And when the rest soon followed Frieda, Emily breathed deeply and freely.

Emily wanted none of them. She wanted to be alone with the clean, strong thing that was within her. She wanted to hold this feeling, nurture it. She stood before the fire. She felt as if she were floating in space, water, isolate and pure out of the world. She was brought back to reality when the butler came to her to say "Mr. Trevor has phoned. He wanted to know what time he should call for you."

She pursed her lips. "Tell him she ran her fingers over her mouth—"tell him I'm out, that I'm busy, I won't be able to make it tonight." Nor an answer, she added to herself. "Hurry, hurry, if she had no time to lose, she took a coat from the wardrobe. "I'm going for a walk, Roger," she told the butler.

And as she walked she remembered something that Frances had said. "The girl who has a right to be Karin Ellis." She smiled now to think that she had planned to save the compliment for one of her own people. She decided to think how near she had come to being one of the girls. Well, they might envy Karin Ellis, but Karin Ellis would never speak of her low spell. She felt that now for the first time in all her days she was completely free. She did not know precisely why. Certainly not just because a forty-odd year old woman across the Atlantic had said she was free because she had refused to resign herself to compromise as Frances and the rest of them had. But she was in no mood to analyze.

This she knew—she was happy to be herself. She would not be anyone else in the world. She had made her mind up, but that was living—the kind of life she had to lead—and looking back now it all seemed inevitable, pre-ordained something beyond her. She did not know that she would change any of it. But she was through with looking back. She had never been one with the world, but she was at last—one with herself.

She faced the days ahead. She was ready for them. Ready for the good and rich things in store—ready, as well, for the bad. She stood on the curb looking across at the building, her building. She paused for a moment, a distant smile on her face, before she started across the avenue.

A janitor opened the door for her. She made her way through a maze of glass cases displaying packages of Karin Ellis' this and Karin Ellis' that. And in the elevator as she went up—up and up—she asked the operator, "Do you hear the music?"

"No, Miss Ellis, I don't hear no music."

It was dark in her office. She did not need the light. She walked swiftly to the window and stood looking out into the blue night. While she stood, she opened the window and held her face to the cold wind. She did not care that it scattered the papers on her desk. Already she was full of plans. She would open small seasonal shops in Newport and Alken and Miami. She would buy out Kauffman, she would—

She walked quickly to her desk and flicked on the lamp. But with pencil in her hand she found that she could not formulate her ideas. Nor did that matter, for they suddenly seemed not worth formulating. She had another plan now. One, she realized, that must have been in the back of her head and head for some time. She laughed lightly to herself. "Left," she said, "are you still waiting?"

"I've been waiting for years."

"Could you wait just a little bit longer?"

"You know it," he said. "But how much longer?"

"Say about two hours."

And to both of them those two hours stretched ahead limitlessly. "Hurry," Jeff said.

PROTESTANT ORPHANAGE NOTES

Repairs to our Orphanage Building this year are very extensive; the new roof alone is a heavy expense.

In the Orphanage at the present time, there are more children than at any time in the history of the institution. They are nice, bright children from all sections of the province and practically all between the ages of 3 and 12.

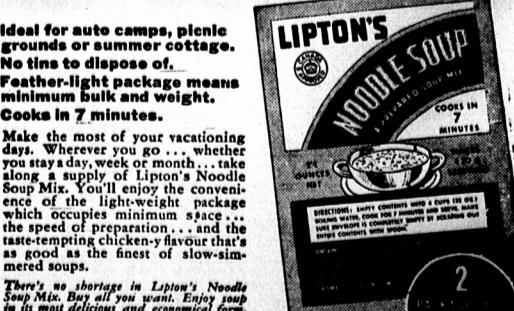

With such a very large family;
