Raise Poultry," Public Urged

IN CITIES AND SUBURBS, SMALL FLOCKS WILL ADD IMPORTANTLY TO FOOD SUPPLY.

Mrs. Claude R. Wickard is following the advice of her husband, Mrs. E. W. Wickard, who is raising poultry this year. Mrs. Wickard is shown feeding some of the small chickens on their Carroll County, Ind., farm.

Prepared for NEA Service by the Department of Agriculture Bureau of Animal Industry.

Keeping poultry in city backyards or suburban areas where local regulations permit offers many families who depend entirely on commercial markets for their poultry and eggs an opportunity to produce part of their food at home and thus make an important contribution to the national food program.

Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard, national food administrator, in calling for increased food production to meet wartime needs, said: "I urge everyone who can, to raise poultry this year, both for the eggs and the meat."

In planning for back-yard poultry, the first thing of course is to get the dependable information from local authorities on the regulations or zoning ordinances covering the raising of poultry in your community. Where the project is permissible, the next step is to decide what type of poultry to keep. Nearly everybody will want chickens—with visions of fryers, broilers, and fresh laid eggs. Ducks also are suitable for some localities, but if numerous they make considerable noise.

10 CHICKS PER PERSON

The selection of stock for a flock of chickens usually is determined on the basis of local conditions and personal preference. You may buy native pullets, laying hens, day-old chicks, or so-called "started chicks" which are from 3 to 4 weeks old. You also may specify pouter chicks, cockerels, or strains of run chicks. When meat only is desired, there is a slight price advantage in buying cockerels chicks of certain breeds.

When the flock is to be raised as the principal source of the family's supply of eggs and poultry meat, the U. S. Department of Agriculture recommends the purchase of 10 young chicks to each member of the family of five would start with 50 chicks and could expect to raise about 40 of them. Losses vary considerably according to the care given the birds, especially in brooding, and the control of rats and other hazards.

Of the 40 chicks raised, about 20 will be cockerels, available for eating at various stages of growth. Of the 20 pullets, about four probably should be culled out and eaten, leaving 16 available for laying. If of reasonably good laying strain, the 16 pullets should produce from 5 to 10 eggs a day during most of the year. This would provide at least an egg a day for each member of the family of five.

In starting the flock with baby chicks, orders should be placed at least a month before the chicks are desired and only chicks from U. S. pullover-tested stock should be ordered. The term "U. S. pullover tested" means that the breeding stock that produced the hatching eggs has been tested under official supervision for pullover disease, an infection that causes heavy losses in young chicks. The purchase of your chicks from pullover-tested stock is reasonable assurance that the young chicks will get a good start.

mouth. Why didn't he bite him, wondered John, wandering vaguely down the long dim corridors of his mind. It would have been headily with those soldiered-off white teeth—the eyeteeth a little longer than the others.

And at last he woke for good. A dreadful dante waking in the pitch dark. Hours until he got his early tea; how was he going to endure it? He would make some other arrangement, now that he was embarking on this endless tedious job of rounding up the girl he loved. He would get that nice old Grace to bring him up a tray of things so that he could make his own tea if he waked in the small hours of the morning. Until he had something hot, he could not think. Cautiously he got out of bed and went to the door. Five o'clock. As he stood there the old clock in the hall accommodately wheezed out the hour. Five o'clock! How was he to endure it? With a groan he turned and lay back into bed again. Living there his thoughts twisted and turned. Should he go up to London and tell his chief that he must be allowed to get free from this job? That having found out more or less who was responsible for the signalling someone else must take it on. That it was impossible, in the circumstances, to continue with it. That although he entirely realized that in his profession personal consideration counted for nothing at all, he was not able to adapt himself to such an outlook. That... and then John Wynter buried his face in his pillow and groaned again.

His groan deadened the soft opening of the door. "Your tea, sir," Grace, in cap and apron, stood there. "Shall I switch on the light sir?" She did so, sliding the sw-to the little bedside table with a careful hand.

"Good God, how did you know I was awake?" A fine gentleman, decided Grace, smiling her cozy little smile. Such grand pajamas, all stripes and silk and open at the throat.

"I heard you open your door, sir," said Grace, feeling very pleased with herself. "And I know what it is to twist and turn and long for a cup of tea, and no one to bring you one. So I thought I'd get up and get on with my work; the drawing room could do with a good turn out. So here it is, sir," said Grace, smiling. "A little bit of bread and butter, although I oughtn't to spare the butter, but I saved a bit because Milly she likes a spot of dripping in it, and better that she should with gentry waiting to be fed," said Grace complacently.

"Good heavens! Look here!" John pointed to the dressing table. "Giving that little black case, will you, Grace?"

"It isn't what you think, sir," Grace stood still. Not for tips was she putting herself out for Mr. Wynter, but because she thought he was a gentleman; she attempted to say so haltingly.

"No, it doesn't enter my head," said John frankly. "But a pound's a pound in these days, Grace. This is it! Take it with my blessing and buy yourself one of these War Certificate if you can spare the money. And don't forget that you've saved my life with this tea," said John, preparing to pour it out and smiling a nice little smile of dismissal.

"Thank you very much indeed, sir," said Grace, taking the hint and going away again. Not that she wouldn't have liked to ask him about the signaling, but perhaps he knew all about it already, thought Grace shrewdly, going into the cold, unheated kitchen.

While John, stuffing a pillow in at his back, prepared to drink his tea and eat his bread and butter slowly. A priceless servant that, he thought about Grace almost with affection. Tea, yes, it was clearing his brain. What he would do with this, thought John, staring at the thick folds of the curtains. He would get off to London that morning. He could catch the nine forty-

How they all like him, thought Mrs. Manvers-Pollock, unrolling her table napkin and wondering in some far away part of her why she had never been able to make anyone like her. Waiting for her porridge, Mrs. Manvers-Pollock sat staring rather bleakly out of the window. Two days... what would she find to do for two days? Not that he was generally in for tea because he wasn't. Nor was Monsieur. Where did Monsieur go for tea? wondered Mrs. Manvers-Pollock suddenly when he became entangled with that abandoned woman who lived in the little cottage perch up on the cliff? (To be Continued)
