Alk always moved so quietly that Dexter would not have believed there could be more tranquility in her progress than he had observed hundreds of times at ready. But she had freed herself from his fingers and glided away from him before he realized what happened. He stepped in from her.

"Aren't you?" he challenged her. "No, not primarily. I haven't begun to give serious thought to marriage, Dexter. I was in love with my husband and he's been dead less than six months."

"But he is dead. You can't live with a memory all your life. You realize that yourself or you wouldn't say you hadn't begun to think about marriage. The very way you say that shows you believe you will begin by and by, and that you will think of seriously sometime."

"Yes, Dexter. I believe I shall."

The complete candor of the statement was disconcerting. Momentarily Dexter was too dumfounded to retort. He would not say you hadn't begun to think about marriage. The very way you say that shows you believe you will begin by and by, and that you will think of seriously sometime."
