Says To Live Dangerously But With Plan. Man With Long Experience Among Youth Tells Secret of Success. PIONEERING. Dr. J. S. Carruthers, Formerly of the Maritimes, Has Had Varied Experience.

(Moncton Transcript) "Live dangerously" but according to plan, a sensible plan and you will succeed. This was the advice to modern youth given by Dr. J. S. Carruthers for fifty-two years an ordained minister of the Presbyterian church, sometime member of the faculty of Pine Hill College, Halifax, and now of the staff of the University of British Columbia, a pioneer in many activities not connected directly with the church.

Dr. Carruthers plans to retire this year from the ministry but expects that he will serve at the University for the next three years. His intimate connection with the youth of two generations had given him an insight into the character of the young man and the young woman of today. Both are prone to live dangerously but without plan, he declared. That seems to be the only fault. Otherwise they were much the same as any other generations, in spite of all that was said.

Explaining what he meant by living dangerously, Dr. Carruthers referred to the pioneers of the hospital movement in the Maritime provinces. He said that it really had not been his work but he had helped wage a bitter fight against centralization of hospital facilities at some one point in each province. The hospital in Charlottetown which he had helped organize had been created largely to demonstrate the value of such hospitals even in the small community rather than one large institution some distance away. He said that he had been connected with the institution in Moncton in the same way.

Pioneering, he said, was one way of living dangerously but according to plan. He said, as well, he had been interested in the technical education in the Maritime provinces and had fought for centralization of that case. At one time negotiations had progressed to the point where Nova Scotia had agreed to help maintain an institution at Sackville for the purpose but there had been some hitch in New Brunswick and co-operation had been found impossible. As a result, Nova Scotia had established a college in Halifax which he said was doing splendid work.

Speaking of co-operation, Dr. Carruthers told of conditions as they were in the theological department at the University of British Columbia. There all churches had united, in the school and students entering the ministry of any one of them studied under the same professors, omitting some subjects, of course, or adding others in their place. It was an ideal example of what could be accomplished by the exercise of toleration, and he predicted widespread benefits from it.

"We feel that if the students can together, study together and talk together that ultimately they will together and there will be furtherance of the cause of true Christianity," Dr. Carruthers asserted. He said that he had often been in Moncton and he asked about many of the older residents of the town and officials of the railway whom he seemed to have kept track of in a marked way. Considering the distance. After visiting Prince Edward Island he is going on to Halifax where he had some business matters to attend to. It will be his last visit to the Maritimes. "I'm getting too old to travel, but they say yet that I live 'too dangerously.' But I like to and I will if I think I can accomplish anything.

Jury Disagree. (Continued from Page 1) If no stealing had been done there could be no conviction. The jury must be satisfied that the possession of the prisoner had been stolen and further that he knew them to be stolen. Some might say that receiving stolen goods was not a very great crime. But it was. It was one of the things that greatly encourage crimes of theft, the fact that they are so readily performed and that the law considers it a crime to purchase things known to have been stolen. The prisoner in this case admitted receiving and having in his possession the goods alleged to have been stolen. It remained for the evidence to prove two things. Were the articles stolen? and did the prisoner know that they were stolen?

There had been a lot of collateral matter brought into the case, but that could all be brushed aside. The essential things were, had all or any of the articles been stolen? For instance there might be some doubt in regard to the sugar, where the evidence of theft was not very strong, but coming down to the half chest of tea, this was perhaps an article that constituted more valuable evidence than any of the others. If the jury believed the story of the prisoner and his wife, the chest was not that stolen from Rattenbury's, for they said there was no hole in it when they bought it, but that they had made the opening in it themselves. If the jury believed the story that had been told by Whitlock and Hunter about what happened they would either have to disbelieve the other story or they would have a very peculiar set of coincidences in the fact that a similar hole had been made by two different parties in similar chests of tea. It was strange both on account of the chests being similar in their unusual shape, and on account of the holes being stuffed in the manner in each occasion - with paper bags. His Lordship said that this was one of the most peculiar coincidences he had ever heard of, and was also a coincidence that a child should spill paint on the chest in such a way as to obliterate one of the identifying marks.

It was for the jury to decide whether a half chest of tea was stolen from Rattenbury's, and if they did this to decide then whether this was the same tea as that taken from Rattenbury's and the hole in it made by Hunter, then the prisoner and his wife had told in Court what was not true. The evidence that a daughter of the prisoner had answered the door should be given was a very hard thing to prove knowledge because it was impossible to read a man's mind. The evidence to be depended upon was circumstantial. As the defending counsel had said, it was evidence of knowledge when the price paid for the goods was very low. Another point was when the goods were found in the possession of the prisoner shortly after the theft.

The jury should remove from its mind anything in the case that had been connected with the Prohibition officers or the police. That had nothing to do with the case. These had certain duties to perform. If they thought they had found evidence of crime it was their duty to report to the proper authorities, and his held goods for citizens in general also. The prisoner alleged he bought the goods from a man named Frank MacDougall, but the jury was not concerned with him, or whether the goods had been stolen by him. The only question they were to deal with was, did the prisoner know the goods were stolen when he purchased them. That was really the great matter, as those were the salient points. If when the jury considered the whole case they had any reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, His Lordship charged them that they had to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt, but if it had been a real doubt existing in their minds.

On the retirement of the jury the next case called was that of William Gormley, James Gormley, and Francis McDougall, charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm. Mr. Justice Hazard presided, and on the prisoners being arraigned, MacDougall failed to answer to the charge. As one of the other prisoners had to be brought in from the County Jail the court adjourned until half past ten this morning.

"Capital Punishment" Offers Fine Film Entertainment. CAST OF TWELVE STARS GIVES UNUSUAL PERFORMANCE IN BRINGING TO LIFE ABSORBING SCREEN STORY. It was only a question of time before some motion picture producer with broad vision and humaneness of soul would come forward and utilize the vast power of the motion picture on behalf of the struggle being waged against capital punishment. That power has finally been enlisted. Yesterday at the Prince Edward Theatre, B. P. Schulberg, producer of Preferred Pictures, presented his own dramatic version of "Capital Punishment."

Here is a theme that is timely and all powerful. The subject matter out of which Mr. Schulberg constructed this picture, although of a somber nature, strikes a chord that will send its tones to every corner of the civilized world. Without any subterfuge, it stands out boldly and frankly against the system of present day society that permits of capital punishment. It goes a step further in its tasks by its arraignment of our system of jurisprudence that will permit the executions of victims convicted by circumstantial evidence only. In its essence it is a melodrama. Interwoven in it, however, are touches of humaneness and through it all runs a beautiful love story - the love of two young people, willing to go through every anguish for each other.

In quality of entertainment, "Capital Punishment" reaches a high standard. In the matter of education, it more than serves its purpose. There have been prison pictures produced before, but none with such a wealth of detail, such a careful adherence to realism. Lavishly produced and sympathetically directed the picture is certain to attract a great deal of attention. Especially will this be true, when the fact is realized that it is good, wholesome entertainment, despite the seriousness of its theme.

The producer has gone a step further than most of his business rivals in the matter of supplying stars for the cast of the picture. He has assembled a cast of star players who perform their parts with intelligence and understanding. They play their roles, with a sense of fitness and show of reality, that each character on the screen seems like one's own next door neighbor. They are not human beings from some far off land, but every-day folk, displaying their emotions, enjoying their moments, and showing their fears, even as we all do.

In addition to the feature, three excellent short subjects were shown. The Fox News, with views of Commander Bryd's Polar flight. The Pathe Review, (always good) and "The Iron Trail" showing the different types of railways in use in all parts of the world. An excellent musical program, including a number of selections from the opera "Marta" completes this fine mid week program, which will be shown today afternoon and evening.
