St. Dunstan's College on June 7th by Peter F. Hughes. A Brilliant Effort Which Shows Sound Thought and Ease of Expression.

The critics, both ancient and modern, who have laid down a rule for composition, have endeavored to enforce above all others the rule which says that each class of writing shall maintain with just decorum its proper place. Horace, a leader in the art of criticism, gives expression to it in his "Singula quaeque locum tenent sortita decem." "Each word might be enforced as justly here as when they were first penned. There is still difficulty in assigning to each its proper place; there is still every possibility of having our ideas confused and inconsistent even as a sick man's dreams; there is still danger of painting dolphins in the woods, horns on the waves.
