PRINCE COUNTY GUARDIAN

Offices in Summerside, D. K. Currie, Manager and in Alberton, Herbert Clark, Manager.

—Advertisers and subscribers in Alberton and vicinity are asked to hand all matters for The Guardian to Herbert Clark, the company's agent at that place.

—Smallpox, once a loathsome and dreaded thing, may now, thanks to Dr. Jenner and the local health officers, be classed among the "great" diseases of civilized savagery. The few remaining strands of inherited fear that still cling to the name serve only as limelight glints to the stage effect. The terror of those who doubt that the thing has been extracted, the shrinking of those who, under the abhorrent looks, still detect the muscles of the Goliath, are being successfully utilized in intensifying the comedy and making it real.

Not many moons ago a young man while shopping in a village—less than one hundred miles east of Summerside—felt slightly indisposed and decided to consult a physician. He did so. Esculapian looked at him over, shook his head ominously and telephoned for his brother practitioners. They were immediately on his scene. A hurried consultation followed; the young man was told he had smallpox and ordered home at once, and, sooner, out of the office. He left but as there were some important items of shopping to be attended to he called at several stores in the village and made his purchases before proceeding homeward. In the meantime the doctor had telephoned the dread news to the central store in the young man's district, advised the immediate organization of a Board of Health and the quarantining of the home of the afflicted young man together with that of a young man who accompanied him. While the wires were still tingling with the consternation that accompanied this message, the young man himself, to the horror of those in the secret, walked into the store. He was peremptorily ordered out and he went. The awful word, smallpox, took to itself wings and began the round of the settlement. Like the fiery cross it soon collected the residents who, with one accord, proceeded at once to the organization of a live, militant and aggressive Board of Health. This concluded, a signalling corps was appointed and provided with the proverbial yellow flag. Their first duty was to flag the home of the afflicted one. Warily and fearfully they approached the infected house. The afflicted man saw them coming and anticipating their design, went out to remonstrate. They saw him, or rather, they saw the smallpox and fled precipitately. He returned to the house. Inspired by a fervid desire to prevent the spread of the scourge and so save the people, they again essayed to plant the flag on the gate-post. Again the patient saw the attempt upon his liberty and again he approached the enemy, leisurely, deliberately, like one who holds in his hand the keys of life and of death. Again the devoted signalling corps retired at the double quick. Several further attempts and bloodless, wordless repulses followed and the flag was not planted. Meanwhile the scare was spreading. Far and near the stores visited by the young man, fear of the plague, and a deeper fear of the hated flag that represented the scourge. But this was as nothing in comparison with the agitation that was now stirring in the bosoms of seven young maidens who, on the day preceding the outbreak of the scourge, had had the pleasure—one at a time of course—of driving at the "picnic" with the object of all the scare. Each is still canvassing her system for symptoms of the disease, each racking her memory for specific courses of infection. And during the remainder of the twenty-one days, the period of smallpox infection, this fear will gnaw at their young hearts like a canker. And so the dreaded smallpox scourge progressed—in people's minds.
