Obedience

OTTAWA, March 4 — Spanking, strapping or slapping a disobedient child should seldom be done and then only as a last resort.

The mental health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare gives this advice in a new pamphlet on child training.

Such punishment used too frequently creates resentment in the child who is too small to defend himself and this resentment is apt to result in the child showing cruelty to others when he is older. It may also make it difficult for him to accept authority in later life.

The publication, "Obedience" offers suggestions to parents on teaching their children to do what they are told.

When you ask your child to do something "never let him get the impression that you expect him to do otherwise." Make as few demands as possible but be sure they are carried out, and "mean what you say."

Nothing makes it so difficult for a child to learn good habits as when the parents are lax one day and strict the next. Asking a child to do things, rather than ordering him, is advised since it helps him to learn to co-operate. Bribing is bad because the child should learn that running errands is his own important contribution to the well-being of the household.

The "coaxing method" such as "Do this for mother's sake" is an admission of weakness and "an unfair appeal to the child's sympathy. He will soon tire of it." Children should be asked to undertake certain duties, such as putting away toys, from a very early age. This helps them develop a habit of responsibility.

Parents are advised to look for the cause of the trouble when their child is especially troublesome and disobedient. The reason may be fatigue, a cold coming on, stomach ache, or a feeling of insecurity in his parent's affection because a baby brother or sister is getting their attention.

Punishment in any form should only be used to influence the child to do the right thing and shouldn't be the result of the parent losing his temper. Isolating a disobedient child often gets good results.

Obedience in a child is important, it is stressed, "not just to get a job done or an errand run, but to help him become a happy and successful adult. If the child learns to be obedient for the common good of the family, he will grow up to be a good citizen ready to co-operate for the welfare of the community as a whole." The pamphlet, one of a series, is available free of charge through the provincial health departments.
