The House of Dreams-Come-True

By Margaret Pedler

Jean supposed he was probably reproaching himself for his conduct that afternoon. After all, she reflected, he was normally a man of decent instincts, and though the flood-tide of his passion had swept him into taking advantage of the circumstances which had flung them together in the solitude of the little inn, he would be the first to agree, when in a less lawless frame of mind, that his conduct had been unpardonable. Although, even from that, one could not promise that he would not be equally culpable another time!

Blaise had proved painfully correct in his estimate of the dangers attaching to unexploded bombs. Jean admitted it to herself ruefully. And she was honest enough also to admit that, with his warning ringing in her ears and with the memory of what had happened in the rose-garden to illumine it, she herself was not altogether clear of blame for the incidents of the afternoon.

She had played with Burke, even encouraged him to a certain extent, allowing him to be in her company far more frequently than was altogether wise, considering the circumstance of his hot-headed love for her.

It was with somewhat of a mental start of surprise that she found herself seeking for excuses for his behaviour—actually trying to supply adequate reasons why she should overlook it!

His brooding, sulky silence as he drove along, mile after mile, was not without its appeal to the inherent femininity of her. He did not try to excuse or palliate his conduct, made no attempt to sue for forgiveness. He loved her, and he had let her see it; manlike, he had taken what the opportunity offered. And she didn't suppose he regretted it.

The faintest smile twitched the corners of her lips. Burke was not the type of man to regret an unlawful kiss or two!

She was conscious that—as usual, where he was concerned—her virtuous indignation was oozing away in the most discreditable and hopeless fashion. There was an audacious charm about the man, an attractiveness that would not be denied in the hot-headed way he went, all out, for what he wanted.

Other women beside Jean had found it equally difficult to resist. His sheer virility, with its splendid disregard for other people's claims and its conscienceless belief that the battle should assuredly be to the strong, earned him forgiveness where, for misdeeds not half so flagrant, a less temperate sinner would have been promptly shown the door.

But no woman—not even the women to whom he had made love without the excuse of loving—had ever shown Burke the door or given her the kind of treatment which he had thoughtfully well merited twenty times over. And Jean was no exception to the rule.

As least he had some genuine claim on her forgiveness—the claim of a love which had swept through his very being like a flame, the fierce passion of a man to whom love means adoration, worship—above all, possession.

And what woman can ever long remain righteously angry with a man who loves her—and whose very offence is the outcome of the vermastering quality of that love? Very few, and certainly none who so very much a woman, so essentially feminine as Jean. It was in a very small voice, which she endeavoured to make airily detached, that she at last broke the silence which had reigned for the last six miles or so.

"I suppose I shall have to forgive you—more or less. One can't exactly quarrel with one's next door neighbour."

Burke smiled grimly. "Can't one?"

"Well, there's Judith to be considered."

A rather curious expression came into his eyes.

"Yes," he agreed. "There's Judith to be considered." There was a hint of irony in the dry tones.

"It would complicate matters if I were not on speaking terms with her brother," pursued Jean. She waited for his answer, but none came. The threatened possibility contained in her speech appeared to have fallen on deaf ears, and the silence seemed likely to continue indefinitely.

Jean prompted him gently. "You might, at least, say you are sorry for—"

"For kissing you?"—suddenly. "Yes"—flushing a little.

"But I'm not. Kissing you"—with deliberation—"is one of the things I shall never regret. When I come to make my peace with Heaven and repent in sackcloth and ashes for my sins of omission and commission, I shan't include this afternoon in the list, I assure you. It was worth it—if I pay for it afterwards in hell."

He was silent a moment. Then: "But I'll promise you one thing. I'll never kiss you again till you give me your lips yourself."

Jean smiled at the characteristic speech. She supposed this was as near an apology as Burke would ever get.

"That's all right, then," she replied composedly. "Because I shall never do that."

He flicked the chestnut lightly with the whip. "I think you will," he said. "I think"—he looked at her somewhat enigmatically—"that you will give me everything I want—some day."

CHAPTER XXIII ON THE SIDE OF THE ANGELS Throughout the day following that of the expedition to Dartmoor, Nick seemed determined to keep out of Jean's way. It was as though he feared she might force some confidence from him that he was loth to give, and in consequence, deliberately avoided being alone with her.

On the second day, however, as luck would have it, she encountered him in the corridor just outside her own sitting-room. He was striding blindly along, obviously not heeding where he was going, and had almost collided with her before he realised that she was there.

He jerked himself backwards. "I beg your pardon," he muttered, still without looking at her and made as though to pass on.

Jean checked him with a hand on his sleeve. She had not watched the dogged sullenness of his face throughout yesterday to no purpose, and now, as her swift gaze searched it anew, she felt convinced that something fresh had occurred to stir him. It was impossible for Jean to see a friend in trouble without wanting to "stand by."

"Nick, old thing, what's wrong?" she asked. He stared at her unseeing. "Wrong?" he muttered. "Wrong?"

A miscellaneous shower party was tendered to Mr. and Mrs. Morris Caseley (nee Doris MacPherson), the newly-weds on Friday evening at the home of the groom's parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Caseley of Kelvin. A large number of young and old folk, assembled from the neighboring communities, for the purpose of extending to Mr. and Mrs. Caseley, every good wish for a bright and happy wedded life together. When the guests were all assembled, a nicely worded address was read by Mr. David Murphy and Mr. Robert Hogg; made the presentation of a well filled purse on behalf of the friends gathered here. Mr. Caseley thanked the donors for their beautiful gifts and good wishes. They were also the recipients of many beautiful and useful gifts for their home, from their many friends in Kensington and vicinity. All joined in the good old song "For They Are Jolly Good Fellows." After which a delicious lunch was served by the hostess and assisting hostesses. The remainder of the evening was pleasantly spent in contests, games, etc. Mr. Harold Leard, then favored the guests with a solo, which was greatly enjoyed. A very pleasant hour was spent in dancing as the strains of music were pleasingly rendered by Mr. Stan Thompson, Mr. Heath Mayhew and Mr. Robert Hogg.

There passed away at his home in Traveller's Rest on Saturday night, Mr. William MacDonald at the age of 75 years. He was a loving husband and father, a true and sincere friend and a devoted member of the Roman Catholic Church at Seven Mile Bay. He leaves to mourn a sorrowing widow and one son, James at home, two daughters in the United States. The funeral services were held from his late home to the Seven Mile Bay Church and Cemetery, on Monday. The Rev. Father Monaghan, officiating. To the bereaved the Guardian extends the most sincere sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Mrs. Heath Mayhew and charming little son, Claire, of Margate, have been spending a short holiday in Kelvin the welcome guests of her mother, Mrs. William Caseley.—B.

IN MEMORIAM JAS. M. HUGHES The death occurred at St. Mary's Road on March 23rd, from heart trouble of James H. Hughes in his 73rd year.

Enjoying apparent good health the late Mr. Hughes was about as usual until he was suddenly stricken, passing away shortly after receiving the last rites of the Church from Rev. George McDonald.

Although a life long resident of St. Mary's Road, where he pursued farming operations, he was well and favorably known throughout the province as a first class bricklayer, many contracts, both in this city and other sections of the Island bearing evidence to his excellent workmanship.

He leaves to mourn, besides a sorrowful widow, the following family: Stephen and James of Bear River; Joseph, Attleboro, Mass.; Patrick, Roxbury, Mass.; Thomas, Mrs. Arthur McKensie, Mrs. Bernard Callaghan, Charlottetown and Bernard, Roy and Grace, St. Mary's Road.

Two sisters also survive: Mrs. Ellen McCarron, St. Mary's Road, Mrs. Patrick Clinton, Souris. Also two brothers: Patrick M., Souris, and Thomas M., St. Mary's Road. The funeral was held to Sturgeon

Miss Gertrude Dutton tells why she makes her Devil's Food Layer Cake with Magic Baking Powder

"I know from experience," says the cookery expert of Western Home Monthly, "that Magic makes most baked dishes look and taste better. Its uniform leavening quality gives dependable baking results."

And Miss Dutton's praise of Magic is seconded by the majority of dietitians and cookery experts throughout the Dominion. They use Magic exclusively because they know it is pure, and always uniform.

Canadian housewives, too, prefer Magic. In fact, Magic outsells all other baking powders combined.

For luscious layer cakes, light, tender biscuits, delicious pastry—follow Miss Dutton's advice. Use Magic Baking Powder.

FREE COOK BOOK—When you bake at home, the new Magic Cook Book will give you dozens of recipes for delicious baked foods. Write to Standard Brands Ltd., Fraser Ave. and Liberty St., Toronto, Ontario.
