A Sweetheart At Thirty

THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION

By Marion Rubincam

THE NEWS FROM TOWN

Chapter 103

Violet's letter was usually thick. It was dated Sunday, and I judge from the length of it that she must have spent all her Sunday afternoon writing it. "Dear Aunt Edna," she began. "I wish you would come back. I know you don't want to stay in as poky a place as Healy Falls, and mother's actually getting tired of the city. I don't believe she ever really did like it; she came from curiosity, and now she wants to go back. Imagine! I think I'd better tell you the news first. Uncle Francis—he told me to call him that isn't it funny I have to practice it again and again, and such a look as he gives me when I forget and call him Mr. Meade—anyway, to get back to what I was going to say, Uncle Francis sent the college a check for my next term, which begins in a week!

"When that lovely of him? I simply hugged him for it, which mother thought wasn't quite proper, but he liked it, and pretended to think it was more than reward for the little money the college term cost him. Fancy having so much money that you can sign checks to colleges and not think about it twice!

"His letters were always more mature than she was, and I always smiled as I read what she had written. This time James was in the room, waiting eagerly for news of his sister. I went back and started her letter again from the beginning, reading it aloud to James, so he could share it.

"Uncle Francis says he wrote you about who he had done, so I needn't bother to. Wasn't it really lovely of him? I wish he knew how grateful I was—and always will be. Of course, it's poor, plodding James that should go and not scatterbrained me, but that's life, isn't it?—the rewards of the underserving."

"That's a college girl's idea for you," murmured James in derision at this piece of 19-year-old philosophy.

"Mother says the city makes her nervous, the letter went on. At first she loved to turn the hot water faucet on and see the steamy water pour out, and that's lost its novelty for her and now she calls a nice large kitchen where a body can move about. I tried to tell her how inefficient a huge barn of a kitchen was, but you can't tell mother anything. I don't mean to be disrespectful, but she just won't let any new ideas percolate.

"And she won't go out. So evenings when I don't have so much to do, I sit around and talk or play games—I hate cards—or else we play go out. I expect that isn't true, since mother's my guest, but when Bud is here, she's hateful to him and she hates to budget after dinner. Anyway, please please come back—I miss you so much!"

A little feeling of warmth and measure went through me again. I was going back to my tiny circle of friends, to my charming snug little apartment, to my adored golden-haired niece who was my adopted daughter—and best of all, to Francis.

"Uncle Francis says when you come, and when you are ready."

wire him and he'll take a few days off and come up in the car and set you and drive you down. He's been awfully busy with Bud's case and getting his office so he can leave it for that gorgeous wedding trip he's planning. Most of it's to be a secret from you, you'll only know where you're going as you get taken along—but I know all about it! "I've saved up Bud's affair till the last; expect because it is the most important." "He got off, didn't he?" James asked eagerly. "Yes he got off, I answered, my eye running rapidly down the lines of the paper. "Thank heaven!" James murmured.

"The last part of the hearing was yesterday, and Uncle Francis took me down, and I skipped a couple of lectures to be there. It was awful—I was simply terrified. They had Bud up for a few questions and Pete too and that awful Mr. Simons. Pete's working somewhere. Tots told me later, in one of the department stores. She's really a nice sort after all."

"Then there was a dreadful wait, and I wanted to shriek! It was so nervous. Uncle Francis said it was all right, this last was partly formality, everyone knew what would happen. It was the last of the investigation into the Wall Street kidnappings and Simon's isn't the Master Mind. He's really a man after all."
