though not so durable—substitute, I have found nothing better than the thick corrugated paper packing used to protect fragile articles in transit through the mail. If this is cemented into the bottom of the insect box, and the insect pins are thrust into the rib of the paper, it will be found that there is sufficient grip to hold the specimens firmly in place. If preferred a sheet of white paper may be superimposed to hide the corrugated packing. Personally I do not recommend the "Rikker Mount," in which the insects are bedded in cotton wool ("batting.") It looks pretty but is apt to pull off the insects' legs and other appendages, when the specimen is removed for examination.

This hint may prove valuable to scholars who are preparing insects for the Central School Fair.

REVIVAL OF FALCONRY

To the magazine "Natural History" of June 1932, Professor George G. Goodwin, of the American Museum, New York, contributes a capital article on the revival of falconry or 'hawking' in Great Britain. Hawking was a national sport in Britain from Norman times down through the Middle Ages, and it was the invention and perfecting of the hand-gun that led to its decline as a pastime. There is, of course, no reason why it should not regain its place in the field sports of the present day; and in Scotland, where game is plentiful and where there is a great extent of suitable moorland, hawking is being revived with considerable success. It is contended that the game is not driven away from the regions where falcons are used, and there are no crippled birds to escape and die by degrees, for the quarry is either killed outright or goes scot-free. In both instances the practice is favored with the protection of game laws.

Falcons must be subjected to training, the object of which is to render them obedient. In Holland the adult migrant hawks are caught, while in Scotland the young are taken from the nest; the latter are referred to as "eyess laid." The "dash and style" of the adult hawks, to the falconer begins his training by placing the young on a staff in an open basket, feeding them with fresh meat tied to a board; and interfering with them as little as possible. The wilder they are the better. For fully three weeks they are allowed freedom, but as soon as they kill for themselves, they must be taken in for training.

At this time a soft leather hood is placed on the bird's head, covering the eyes, and "jesses"—short strips of leather—are fastened round the legs, above the feet. The jesses are joined by a string, to which is attached the leash, fastened to a block. A tiny bell is attached to each foot, above the jesses; the object is to let the hawk know what the hawk is doing, particularly if lost, since the tinkle of the bells can be distinctly heard for more than a quarter of a mile. Carrying is the most important factor in training so the bird is carried, on a gloved hand, for as many hours as possible each day. The trainer at this time must endeavour to win the hawk's confidence, which act demands unlimited patience. In these birds are among the wildest and shyest in existence.

The feeding is at first done through the hood, but later the hood is removed and the feeding is done by candlelight. When the light is used to people by artificial light; but in all cases the hood is replaced before the end of the meal. After a week of carrying, a young hawk will look forward to his daily tip and will jump on his trainer's fist to get the scrap of lean meat which should always be there.

Now comes the training for striking at the quarry without carrying it away, as hawks are wont to do. The "lure" is now brought into use and it is noted that this is the most important part of the falconer's equipment. It is a padded weight, leather-covered, and with pigeon's wings attached to each side. It has strings for the attachment of meat and a long string on which to swing. This is a dangerous time for the hawk, for if it should strike the weight in free flight it would kill itself.

The feeding is now transferred to the lure, instead of from the fist, and after a few lessons the bird will immediately go to the lure for food. The distance it has to fly is gradually increased to fifty yards or more, still with the cord attached to the jesses. The weight is discarded from the lure as soon as the bird finds that it is too heavy to carry away, and the next step is to swing the lure free so that the bird grasps it as it hits the ground.

Little now remains but to try the bird at "jesses" flying, the falconer having approached his game "up wind" must be ready to slip the hawk at a moment's notice. "In England it is not unusual to slip a falcon after rooks more than a quarter of a mile away." Goshawks, "which are extremely plucky birds, in early spring, in Britain, rooks and martins provide

Relates Events Previous To Actress' Death

(A.P. By Guardian's Special Wire)

WEST CHESTER, Pa., Sept. 19.—William J. Kelly, cameraman friend of wealthy Henry H. Rogers, Jr., tonight told a coroner's jury his version of the drinking party and quarrel in Rogers' country home the night blonde Evelyn Hoy was found shot to death in a bedroom.

Miss Hoy's efforts to borrow money for the chauffeur led to a few words with Rogers, Kelly asserted, "but I don't know what they were."

Kelly, relating chronologically the incidents leading to the finding of Miss Hoy's body the night of Sept. 11, said Frank Catalano, Rogers' chauffeur, met him and Rogers at Philadelphia and drove to the farmhouse early Sept. 11.

Kelly said they set off some firecrackers after sleeping late in the morning. Subsequently, Kelly related, he and Rogers went to the living room.

"I heard what I thought was a firecracker and I thought Miss Hoy must be up to those tricks again."

In a low voice, Kelly said "Mr. Rogers mentioned something about a gun. He ran upstairs."

The witness then quoted Rogers as saying "she's done it."

Miss Hoy must be up to those tricks again."

The witness replied in the negative, adding that he offered to give her what he had, but she declined.

At the time of the shooting it was reported the actress had sought to return to her New York home by train.

River Waters Keep Marine Borers Away

Saint John, Sept. 20.—(CP)—Marine borers, cause of damage running into millions of dollars at points along the Atlantic seaboard, offer no menace to the port of Saint John owing to a safeguard in the form of the St. John river, according to expert opinions secured by Alex Gray, chief engineer and general manager of the Saint John Harbour Commission. Fresh water from the river so reduced the salinity of the harbor water that the borers cannot exist.

"There is certainly no very alarming situation at the present time although there has been some attack by Gribble at certain points in the harbor," said Dr. A. H. Leim, director of the biological station at St. Andrews.

"Gribble would not say that the attack was very pronounced in comparison with most other places in the Bay of Fundy but Saint John has in the past enjoyed freedom from this pest, presumably because of the amount of fresh water entering the harbor. The present situation would appear to be transitory and next year's spring freshet will likely clean out the borers."

"The much more serious borer known as the Ship Worm or Tereido has never been found in Saint John nor is it there at the present time."

What's this? Oh, it's a kiddie car! Challenger's famed quintuplets are getting inquisitive about these pieces of machinery which invade their nursery, particularly little Annette at the extreme LEFT who not only wants to examine the car but also to find out how it goes. "Tut, tut," chides Emelle, NEXT, that's no way for a lady to act." Cecile, Yvonne and Marie, in that order, are just as interested in their latest plaything and you can see Yvonne fully intends to do the steering. Perhaps she figures she's the boss anyway.
