Story of Marine Stand Thrills in "Wake Island"

As gripping a film as has ever been projected on the Prince Edward Theatre to-day, is Paramount's "Wake Island," a masterpiece of a movie telling the story of the little band of outnumbered Marines who for fourteen days stood off the pounding of Jap invasion forces and by so doing thrilled the hearts of all Americans and wrote glorious Marine history.

The film is a story of that small contingent of fighting Marines, outnumbered and facing superior forces with the knowledge they were going to take a terrific pounding to make the Japs pay a terrible toll for the Leathernecks fought on, determined when they wanted.

Each performance of the actors is flawless. They themselves go through their roles as though inspired, and they undoubtedly were just as the entire American public was by the magnificent stand made by our Marines.

As red-blooded movie entertainment, "Wake Island" should not be missed. As an example to every American of courage and determination against odds it must be seen.

Screen Fights at New High in Action Hit!

Charles Starrett and Russell Hayden set a new high for screen fights in Columbia's "Lawless Plainsmen," which is now at the Empire Theatre.

Starrett fights two heavies in breath-taking fist battles and has a pulse-pounding knife fight with an Apache Indian. Hayden has a bitter scuffle with one heavy, a knife battle with an Indian and a second rough-and-tumble encounter with another Indian.

STEADY GROWTH—The Consumer Branch of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board has grown steadily since it was organized in Canada and the week membership reached 10,000. This large membership was accomplished in a short time. Mrs. J. K. Leppard of Swift Current, Sask., was the ten thousandth Canadian woman to be enrolled as a member. She is a housewife and is making the best use of her money. The main object of this Woman's Regional Advisory Committee is the controlling of prices and prevention of inflation. Such committees are established in all parts of the Dominion.

BURIED IN SAINT JOHN—Friends in Saint John will regret the passing of Mrs. Marion Robertson, widow of William J. Robertson, which occurred in Toronto after a long period of declining health following a serious major operation. Mrs. Robertson's husband was formerly traveling representative of the old Saint John firm of Daniel and Boyd—the London House—and afterwards represented the firm of Greenhalghs Ltd., Montreal. During the past few years, she has been making her home in Toronto with relatives. The funeral service was held in Saint John on Wednesday, April 7, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon at the St. John's Anglican Church. The Rev. J. A. Thompson officiated. Burial was in the St. John's cemetery. (St. John's Telegram Journal, 6th.)

CHAPTER X "SHE HAS DISAPPEARED!"
"It seems to me," Lorbrook said, after a pause, "that the best bet is to get after Whenbawne. At Jerry has got away with Mather's formula, it will be out of the country before you can say 'kiss and run.' I don't think they'll have some smart men to get cracking on it. Our only hope seems to be to persuade Whenbawne to work for us. Then we could at least hope to have the stuff going as soon as the Hun does. It's making the best of a bad job, but that seems the safest line to take."

"Yes, if they got Mather's formula, but it's not certain they did, though of course it is possible."

"Any reason to think they may not have done?" Benny asked.

"Well, have to keep Bill off Whenbawne somehow. Of course, it is the girl he's after, though probably she'll scratch his eyes out. Then, as I thought struck him, I suppose Whenbawne didn't kill Mather because no reason to love him, has he?"

"He didn't kill him. He hasn't the strength to do that. He's got a nerve, but I'm sure she didn't."

"And I am," Bill said, shortly.

"Get back to the main theme," Fenston went on. "Mather's vague reason to think the Hun didn't get the papers. Charley Duranport was a bit on the queer side, a half-wit, in fact, and it seems that he has something up his sleeve. He was in the Duranport house when he was shot dead when he found him. I think we can get anything else out of him. It is just possible he may have some through the dining man's pockets, or Duranport may have given him the papers. His general air of cunning suggests he is keeping something back."

"If he is, and Jerry knows it, Charley's cleverness will probably catch him out," Lorbrook commented.

"It's part of your job to keep an eye on him," Fenston said.

"Laurey! Haven't you got a few babies we can nurse in between times?" Benny asked, sarcastically.

"You know you can have help if you want it, Bill," said Fenston. "I think you'll do better just the two of you. This is not a heavily-populated district, and strangers attract attention."

"Lorbrook got up from the table. 'I think you've told us all we need to know, except where Charley Monkford lives. If we want any help I'll let you know. I take it you won't be staying about here?'"

"No. This is only one of the jobs I'm interested in. Remember Bleeson, the landlord here, is all right. First-rate chap, in fact. He'll help you, especially with the local angle. As if timed to the second, there came an answer to Fenston's invitation, the landlord's daughter came into the room.

"The man has brought round your car, Mr. Fenston," she said. "You asked for it at nine-thirty. Are you ready?"

"Yes, I'm coming now," Fenston answered. He turned to his two companions. "I must get away. I think you've got everything. I'm reporting to me as usual. Good-bye." And he was gone.

Lorbrook knew his chief was a man of scarce less importance than a general on the field or an admiral at sea. "Penny," Bill commented, "Fenston always continues to be dramatic. If I didn't know him so well, I should believe he stage-managed all his exits and entrances."

"To blazes with Fenston's exits," said the ever-practical Conners. "I suggest it is about time we got busy doing some exciting on our own account. The girl wants to clear the table, and we'd better go and look for murderers." "Never mind murderers," Bill answered. "We can leave them to the police. Our job is to find Mather's papers or to persuade Whenbawne to part with his formula. Where do we start?"

"As if you don't know! Of course we go to call on Mr. James Whenbawne. At least, we say we have come to see him. Actually, of course, I shall have to entertain him at dominoes or cribbage while you make good-bye eyes at the niece, Jane. I think Whenbawne called her."

Lorbrook was so preoccupied that he took no action to avenge the insult. Indeed he was scarcely conscious of it.

"Yes, we must go to see Whenbawne," he said, as if speaking to himself. "But it's awkward. Deuced awkward."

"We can't pay a social call in the circumstances."

"And we cannot say please were Government agents and what about your plastic," Benny Conners added.

"No, I wonder what his reaction would be if we told him we were acting as unofficial—or even official—body-guards to him. After the affair in the wood he can't be able to help me. Something very nice are objects of unwelcome attention."

"Might work," Benny conceded, "but I have doubts. He doesn't seem to be a man who scares easily."

"At that precise moment the problem was solved. Again came a tap on the door. This time it was heavier, more urgent. 'Mr. Lorbrook,' called the landlord. 'Can I come in?' Mr. Whenbawne is here to see you at once."

Bill threw open the door. "Let him come in," he called. "What's happened?"

Whenbawne was almost inside the room without awaiting the invitation. He tried to speak calmly, but it was plain that he was very much agitated. Bleeson hovered in the background.

"Gentlemen," the old man began. "I hope you will pardon me, but Mr. Bleeson thought you might be able to help me. Something very disturbing has happened."

"Certainly we will if it is within our power," Lorbrook answered. "Won't you sit down and tell us what we can do?"

Whenbawne sat down heavily, but got up again. "No, I cannot rest. I am too worried."

Bill realized that unless he took a firm line valuable time might be wasted in bringing Whenbawne to the point. "But you see we can't help unless you tell us what has happened," he said, a trifle sharply.

"No, No. Of course not. It's my niece. She's disappeared!"
