CHAPTER 10

THE TELL-TALE RING

Lila was having tea with Dorothy in the studio. She had rushed there immediately Herbert had left her after that ill-omened luncheon. But Mr. Jackson had not arrived. She breathed easier again.

It was now nearly five o'clock, and still he hadn't put in an appearance.

"Why doesn't the wretch show up?" Lila fumed to Dorothy. "I've had enough trouble getting here at all; I certainly can't risk the same thing every day." She had told Dorothy all that had happened between herself and Herbert, not even reserving Herbert's unkind words as to Dorothy.

"Poor old Herbert!" laughed Dorothy. "He's about the near hating me as a nice young man can be."

"It's only because he's jealous," Lila defended him quickly, proud of her husband's love for her. "He really admires you very much, Dot—like all other men."

Dorothy shook her pretty head, a quizzical smile in her hazel eyes.

"Not nearly as many men admire me as you pretend to think. I'm not clinging enough. Lila. Men like sweet, soft, cuddly creatures—like you. I'm too inclined to stand on my own feet when trouble comes."

"Well, Heaven knows I'm learning!" breathed Lila fervently. "Or am I too, standing on yours? Oh, Dot, you mustn't let me down. I'd die, if I lost Herbert."

"Didn't you feel that you'd die that night in France, when your fiance moved up the line and you two were torn apart on the very eve of your wedding?"

Lila moved uncomfortably under Dorothy's direct gaze.

"I guess so. I don't remember now. It's frightful, Dot, the way one changes."

Dorothy said abruptly: "I don't believe I'd change."

"But you've never been really in love," countered Lila quickly. And then, when Dorothy didn't answer, she asked: "Have you?"

Dorothy rose and walked to the window. Leaning her bright head against a blue velour curtain, she stared down into the canyon of the street.

"I've had my dreams," she said, after a time, in a low voice.

Lila laughed softly.

"Dreams!" she scoffed. "So did I, when I was very young and very silly. But now—I know reality."

"Then you didn't really love Captain Farquahar?"

"No," said Lila flatly, defiantly. "He was fascinating, and I was crazy."

"And yet, after he sailed, and before you left for France, you used to rush here every afternoon to see if there was a letter," Dorothy reminded her gently.

"C'etait la guerre!" declared Lila. "He was so handsome in a uniform, and it was my first engagement."

"But when you got to France?"

"It was worse," confessed Lila frankly. "We were mad about each other, for the little time it lasted. That's why, in our anguish at being parted on the night before our wedding, we did such a crazy thing as to make that pledge in the presence of all those officers. In the light of reason, the whole affair was absurd. As if we two could bind the future against time and circumstances and death!"

"But Captain Farquahar believed in your pledge. He trusted you!"

Lila sprang to her feet with an impatient exclamation.

"For Heaven's sake, Dot, stop talking about him! He seems to fascinate you. And I want to forget that he ever lived. Of course, I'm sorry, and all that," she added more slowly, "but it's life and fate, and one isn't to blame for what happens."

"No," murmured Dorothy, since Lila's remark was in the tone of a question, but her gaze was remote, and she seemed to be thinking of the past.

At half past five, Lila despaired of Mr. Jackson's putting in an appearance.

"Tell the beast that I'll be in around noon tomorrow," she said, with a resigned sigh, as she kissed Dorothy and left.

All the way home, she hummed a tune under her breath. She was eager to see Herbert; she wanted the reassurance of his kisses, after that incident at luncheon. It was delicious to be on the very verge of a quarrel, because it would be so sweet to make it up. She decided to forgive Herbert, for, of course, he would ask her to do so; but she would appear a trifle reluctant. It would be pleasant to feel her power.

There was no sign of Herbert as she entered the house and tripped up-stairs. Not home yet, she thought, as she opened the door of her dressing-room.

On the threshold, she paused and almost screamed.

Herbert confronted her. He was standing before her dressing-table, and her jewel-case lay open in front of him. He held out something that glittered.

Lila didn't need to be told what that something was.

"This ring!" said Herbert thickly. "It's a wedding ring. It's inscribed inside: 'From Jack.'"

The closing exercises of Chelton school took place on Thursday evening, June 27, with a large number of friends and ratepayers present. The pupils were very carefully examined in various subjects by their teacher, Miss Mae Enman, assisted by Miss Annie Enman, teacher of Sherbrooke school, and Mrs. Earle Pearson, and showed by their quick and ready answers they lost no time during the term. At the conclusion of the examination a lengthy program was carried out by the pupils. An address was read by Verda Craig and Pansy Rogers presented her with a onyx ring, set with pearls. The teacher, although taken by a great surprise, thanked the pupils for their gift, and then distributed to them a number of prizes. Following this, the visitors and pupils were treated to a generous supply of candy by the teacher. Speeches were made by many present. The singing of the National Anthem brought the meeting to a close, but not before the teacher was wished very happy holidays. The people are to be congratulated on securing such an efficient and painstaking teacher for the coming year.

Mr. Charles Schurman, Chelton, was a visitor to Bedeque on Saturday.

Mr. Nathaniel Pearson, Chelton, spent Saturday in Middleton, the guest of his daughter, Mrs. Harry Wright.

Mr. C. W. Ives, North Tryon, was a motorist to the North Side on Sunday last.

Messrs. George Muirhead and George Dawson, Tryon, were Sunday evening visitors to Cape Traverse.

The fine new bungalow being erected at Albany for Mr. Percy Allan, is almost completed and then Albany Village can boast one more householder. Mr. Allan has already erected at Albany Corner a large workshop where it is understood he will carry on a general repair business. Mr. Percy Campbell is the capable carpenter in charge of the building operations.

Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Chisholm and daughter, Miss Helen, North Tryon, spent the week-end in Charlottetown.

Messrs. N. Patterson, Cape Traverse, and J. E. Thomson, Tryon, were visitors to Summerside on Monday evening. Z

Mt. Stewart Notes

On Tuesday evening a serious fire broke out in the residence of Mr. George Gunn, French Village. The fire, which broke out upstairs, was well under way when noticed, and, aided by the gale of wind blowing at the time, soon got beyond control and razed the house to the ground in a short time. Some furniture downstairs was saved, but everything upstairs was a total loss, and we understand there was no insurance.

Mr. J. D. Timmins, up-to-date butcher, while cutting a piece of meat for a customer, gave himself a nasty gash with the knife he was using. He hastily ran to Dr. Martin who luckily was at home, and had it dressed, and it is now healing nicely.

The Mt. Stewart-Savage Harbor mail route has now a change of drivers. Mr. John A. McDonald not having time to attend to it and his farm, having resigned, Mrs. S. J. Dunn now drives it, her tender being accepted.

Mr. Ira Douglas, seed potato inspector, is now home, having wound up his work for the season.

Mr. David Egan has about completed his contract of shingling the roof of the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. John McGuirk, Dromore, has purchased a new Massey-Harris power-sprayer for his potatoes, of which he has a fine crop.

Not to be behind the times, Mr. W. L. McLeod is having a large new potato warehouse built. Mr. Adrian Bradley is the contractor.

Now, with haying in sight, Mr. E. P. Clark, who recently installed an outfit for grinding the knives, is kept pretty much on the hop. F

Handiest thing outside the house, too

FOR years women have declared enthusiastically that "Vaseline" Petroleum Jelly is the "handiest thing in the house". Now men are also singing the praises of this product for all kinds of outside jobs. They keep a jar or tube of "Vaseline" Jelly handy in the garage or barn or toolshed.

To polish nickel—Nickel parts of a car can be kept free from rust by an occasional polish with a soft flannel cloth and a little "Vaseline" Jelly.

For automobile and radio batteries—Battery manufacturers recommend "Vaseline" Jelly as the best medium for coating battery terminals and connections in order to prevent corrosion.

For tools, garden implements etc.—Keep rust from forming on the metal parts by coating them with "Vaseline" Jelly when not in use.

Remember, when you go to buy it, that the trademark "Vaseline" on the label is your assurance that you are getting the genuine product of the Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, Cons'd, 5520 Chabot Ave., Montreal, Canada.
