ELLEN'S DIARY

to a beam at the first alarm. Jamie went to inspect the new corner also did grand-daughter to visit the strange small creature.

Jamie had come to spend the day. He saw a pair of wild ducks—black ones swimming in the stream near his home when on his way this morning. He told us about it at dinner when his grandfather and I must catch up on the news of his affairs. I must hear about the rabbits, the Mutt-dog, the ducks in the poultry house and the cooing. James was interested in finding out how "that smallest" calf is doing; when the first pigs were expected, and with obvious concern, if "the hay in the mow is down to the beam yet."

Dinner was a gala meal today due in no small measure to Jamie's presence. "In their coats—hat's how I like them best!" he said of the potatoes baked in his honor.

We had vegetable soup as an appetizer and if Jamie preferred to enjoy his later, and if when I tasted mine I found I had quite forgotten to add a parsnip to the collection there for piquancy—the one I had walked the length of the dim cellar to procure, we agreed it had been a good meal when we came to its end. A highlight of it and one which James and I much enjoyed was a bowl of Sauerkraut, an appetizing offering from a neighbor's barrel.

And often it is, though one must not consider it thus at a time of giving that "bread cast upon the waters returns." There is an occasion now for casting bread in the call which has reached this land of plenty from the wails of Europe—those neglected bits of humanity left in the tragic wake of a war fought in their fields and meadows, their villages, town and cities, down my street and living conditions these small ones would have been precious indeed to their own folk, quite as dear and deserving as our own children or grand-children. Even as Jamie whose early years have been so protected and happy or his brother whose first steps are being watched with interest, or the wee lass in the house across the lane, as well as many another island child none of whom perhaps may be held in the lap of luxury but at the same time are rich in the loving care of parents and loved ones. To us then comes the call for assistance and "whosoever offendeth one of these little ones it were better . . . As rain streams down my study window to close the day, I remember how easy it is to "offend." Until tomorrow—Diary—Goodnight.

Rotary History Told On 43rd Anniversary

Rotary's forty-third anniversary was observed by the Charlottetown Rotary Club luncheon, and highlighted by an interesting historical address by Dr. J. A. Clark, Past District Governor.

The following guests were present—Messrs. Samuel Kennedy, B. Roy Holman, Charlottetown, and Charles Taylor, Malpeque. During the luncheon the chairman asked former Rotarian Holman to lead the members in song.

Rotarian J. W. P. MacMillan drew attention to the omission in the Governor's letter of any reference to the Beautification Programme in Prince Edward Island although similar movements in both New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were commended.

Following are excerpts from Dr. Clark's address: "Let us begin at the beginning. As you all know, the beginning in Rotary means our revered Paul P. Harris, whose picture you see there on the wall."

As you all know, the beginning in Rotary means our revered Paul P. Harris, whose picture you see there on the wall. Our late President Emeritus in 1905, just forty-three years ago today, called together "four lonesome men," including himself, and suggested that they meet weekly (not for lunch), but in the office of one of them at night.

"His motives were varied, but as he has told us, there were two chief ones; First: His own desire for fellowship, or as he often described it, neighborliness; and Second: His desire for more and better business contacts. The unique feature of the group was that each was selected from a different trade or profession. The first four: a lawyer, a tailor, a coal dealer and a mining operator, talked to one another about their own businesses, and such business talks are still a pleasing feature of Rotary."

"The Service principle seems to Rotary Club in San Francisco, and Rotary Club No. 2 was formed. "The story was told in Canada in 1910, and the Winnipeg Club, No. 35 was organized. In 1911 the story reached London, England, and their club No. 50 was soon followed by the Dublin (Ireland) Club, No. 65 and Belfast, No. 67. The canny Scotchmen evidently had their numbers reserved for them, for the Glasgow Rotary Club was No. 60, and Edinburgh No. 62, but the date of organization was 1912.

First National Convention

"The sixteen Rotary Clubs in the United States met in the first National Rotary Convention in Chicago in 1910, and elected Paul P. Harris as their President and Chesley R. Perry as their Secretary. The Rotary ideal spread rapidly, leaping over boundary lines, across oceans, and was eagerly and gratefully received by men differing in race, colour, religion, language and social customs. The Convention at Duluth formed the International Association of Rotary Clubs in 1912; and honored Paul P. Harris by electing him President Emeritus. In a short time men in five continents, who previously assumed that they had little in common, were sitting down together to lunch and reach out for a new and bigger type of friendship than they had known before, and seeking to bring about social betterment by an association of business and professional men dedicated to the principle of unselfish service to their fellows."

"Rotarian A. F. Sheldon suggested to the 1911 Convention the motto: 'He profits most who serves best.' It was incorporated in the Rotary platform of that year, and has been used generally as our Rotary motto. The form: 'Service above Self' is also used. The Rotary Code of Ethics for business men was adopted in 1915. At the Los Angeles Convention in 1922, the name Rotary International, the revised Constitution and By-laws and the standard constitution for each Rotary Club thereafter organized were adopted. Standard by-laws, as recommended for Rotary Clubs, were also prepared.

"The time this was discovered might be called the day of 'Rotary's Second Birth', which led to its world-wide development and its service to mankind for Crippled Children's Work, Boy's Work, and others too numerous to mention. "Vocational Service was first called business methods. The first be the binding link that has held this complex organization, known as Rotary International, together. At first the aims and objects were fellowship and service; the service for others. The members helped each other in every way, and that spirit of fellowship still characterizes the true Rotarian. Rotarians then made a special point of helping each other in a business way; even preparing lists of business favors that each member did for the other.

"There was also a period in the United States of fun, back-slapping and horseplay; in some clubs this was carried to extremes. There seriously harassed business men liked it, they forgot for the time, their cares; they found they liked to sing, and those who could not sing liked to try; it let off steam. This was the period of the 'Little Prairie Flower' song. The late Judge George Inman gave demonstrations in our club when he returned from the Kansas City Convention in 1918. The calling of Rotarians by their first name, so common in North American clubs, was not generally adopted by the clubs in Great Britain or elsewhere. The Englishman took his Rotary more seriously than we did.

The Rotary Ideal

"The second President of Rotary, Glenn Meade, was the one who said at the Buffalo Convention in 1913: 'Rotary can never attain its full perfection so long as a vestige remains of the notion that Rotary Clubs exist primarily for the exchange of business among its members.' The spirit of the ideal: 'Service above Self' found expression in many different kinds of good works; among these were community service and vocational service. The original club (Chicago), as early as 1906 undertook a community service project, having discovered that fellowship alone would not suffice, and that fellowship, to reach its best, had to rise above the plane of mere personal helpfulness and derive, in part at least, its strength from a united effort or sacrifice for an altruistic cause.

"The time this was discovered might be called the day of 'Rotary's Second Birth', which led to its world-wide development and its service to mankind for Crippled Children's Work, Boy's Work, and others too numerous to mention. "Vocational Service was first called business methods. The first
