"What reason have they to hope that they can gain admission to the smart set?"
"Before they were married each of them denied in at least a dozen interviews that they were engaged."

THE FAN SPEAKS

Now, if this hadn't happened, or that, it's as plain as the brim on your hat. We'd have certainly won in a walk. Too bad—but it's no use to talk.

Professor: Remember, that the effect is always preceded by the cause.
Student: Beg pardon, professor, but in case of a man cutting grass with a lawn mower, the cause follows the effect.

"Decided where you'll spend this summer?"
"No, I'm going to let my wife decide this year. She used to wake me up in the middle of the night last summer to remind me that I picked the place out."

Hubby: My dear, I wish you would go get yourself ready for dinner before the company arrives.
Wife: My gracious. Are they cannibals?

What The Gray House Did

"That sounds as if you anticipated trouble."

"Oddly enough, I do. I must be getting old, but driving back today I began to make excuses for not living in the Gray house. Subconsciously, I was actuated by fear. Most people patronize the subconscious mind nowadays, but it's the subconscious mind that gives you the real danger signal. I'm not going up there with the idea that every prospect is as pleasing as it looks. I'm on guard!"

"If that's so, I demand a salary as well as free board and entertainment. Make it five dollars a day and replace all clothes stained with gore in the exercise of my duty with ones of equal or greater value. The trouble with you is that after piking along on thirty thousand a year and a mere duplex apartment you've got twice that amount and a thirty-room mansion. It has gone to your poor, weak head. You are paying too much attention to poor Aunt Selina."

"You didn't see or hear her," Hanby reminded him.

"She's merely a crank. One morning, thirty long years ago, in the bosky dells that are now yours, she met a rustic swain and pursued him with love. Wisely he jumped into the lake and was drowned. It is a sacred spot to her."

"What about the Seymour chauffeur?"

"An ignorant, good-hearted, generous man, fond of children. His simple, untutored mind believes that evil spirits dwell there because his boss's children ventured on an unsafe bridge and were drowned. Probably he has a dozen kids himself. As to Red Chapin, he took refuge there and was killed by his pals whom he had double crossed. Perfectly plain, as I see it."

"Maybe," Hanby said slowly, "it is merely annoyance that the house I bought for Dina should be mixed up in this tragic business." He spoke almost irritably. "I hate gloom and tears and death. When I first saw the Gray house I said, Here is a place where people have been happy. Pretty rotten pickler, eh, Bill?"

"Your family will take the curse off anything," said the other. "Dina will have us all dancing as happily as ever. Junior will bring his crowd, and Celia will import hers. I miss my guess if the result won't be a very interesting mixture. Dance on!" he concluded dramatically. "Outside your windows your faithful house detective will be watching—the simple-minded sleuth whose meager pay is five dollars a day and extras. During the day I shall be hoe man in chief to Dina. At dusk I am the house detective. I'll get a deputy's badge in case I have to make arrests."

"There was a knock on the door, and Mary Sloan entered.
"You are wanted on the long distance, sir," she told Hanby.
"Hello," said Hanby a few seconds later. "Yes, this is he speaking."

The voice that answered seemed far away, but very distinct. It was plainly that of an educated woman.

"I saw you at Pine Plains this afternoon. You are interested in the murder?"

"Naturally," he replied. "May I ask to whom I am talking?"

"The name would convey nothing. Besides, it would not be the true one."

"Why not?"

"You'll see presently. Are you still determined to live at the Gray house?"

"Why not? I bought the place for that purpose."

"When you bought it you had no idea of its history. You did not then know that it takes toll of every family inhabiting it. Happy families have gone there, but never a happy family left it."

"I am satisfied that with proper care these accidents would have been avoided."

"That's what the real estate people said when they wanted you to buy the place. They lied, naturally. All they want is their commission. Mr. Hanby, in your heart of hearts you know there is some inexplicable but dreadful curse on it."

"I am not weak-minded enough to credit such nonsense. He spoke with unusual violence. 'With common precaution the accidents could have been avoided.'"

"Who told you?"

"A Mr. Appleton." Hanby suddenly realized that he was an employee of the firm which sold the house. He recalled how Appleton had seemed to alter during the interview. In the beginning he had seemed to believe that something beyond human explanation hovered about the Gray house. Then he had become brisk and businesslike, we suggest.

Waterside, with its facilities for bathing, shell-fish digging, and picnicking, is proving most attractive to motor parties. Twelve cars were parked on the shore Tuesday night, and a merry party enjoyed a huge bonfire.

Miss Eva Beers, Superintendent of Mt. Herbert Orphanage, Charlottetown, held a party for boys from the orphanage at the shore. The boys dug quahaugs, built a fire to roast them for their supper, had a fine swim and went home delighted with the day.

Mrs. Clara Z. Mulcahy of Lynn, Massachusetts, motored the Misses Mellish from Boston to the Island. During her stay, the party visited Bay Fortune, Cavendish, St. Peter's Bay, and several other points, but everyone declared none excelled in beauty Waterside, where Mrs. Mulcahy was the guest of Mrs. Malcolm MacRae.
