TESTS BY TORTURE.

The World Is Not Yet Free From This Barbaric Practice.

England, as all the world knows, was the last of civilized countries to abolish the test by torture as a regular legal institution. A historian who has made a special investigation of modern methods of torture has discovered that the barbaric practice is still common in many out of the way corners of the globe. The early English system, too, has been widely imitated. Even in the time of Henry III. the torture trial was in vogue. First came three days of preparation by fasting and prayer. On the solemn day a caldron was made to boil in church, and a stone was placed apparently in the boiling water. Two juries of twelve men apiece were present in the interest of accuracy and accused. Both sides tested the water, and if they agreed that it was boiling the accused thrust in his bare arm and took out the stone. His arm was then wrapped in cloth and sealed. On the third day the priest inspected the arm, and if it was perfectly healed the accused got off. It seems as if the testing representatives may have been tampered with or the examining priest may have been corrupted.

The same preparation was carried out when the other method was tried, which was the carrying of a red-hot bar of iron for three steps. The hand was then sealed and examined as before. As late as 1174 a man was condemned to the boiling water. In all cases the accused had been declared guilty by a jury, and even if he succeeded in the ordeal he was often banished.

In southern India there is a curious case of domestic ordeal. The natives would plunge the arm in boiling oil and come out scatheless. It is well known that the hand, protected by its natural moisture, can be placed in molten metal and not be burned. A missionary tells of a native who was very jealous of his wife. At last the poor woman, wearied by his reproaches, offered to undergo the ordeal.

The husband boiled the oil himself, that there might be no error, and made her insert her hand, keeping it there till he gave her the word to extract it. He let her hand remain in the oil for some time, and when she took it out there was no sign of burning. Knowing the furious jealousy of the man, the missionary had no doubt as to the temperature of the oil. In Arabia there is a more stringent though less dangerous test. A woman carried hot embers in her veil for twenty yards. If her veil did not burn, her innocence was established.

It is well in considering these things to remember that the "fire tests" were the great conjurers' tricks from the time of the Greeks to that of the red Indians. In the rituals of all old religions treading or hot coals, embers, burning stones, etc., was a common rite. It exists in Bulgaria to-day. In Borneo a Chinese meat firm intended to establish a business not long ago. The European inhabitants of the place were astonished to see the street covered for some distance with red-hot embers and a respectable Chinese merchant walking thereon with naked feet. His object was to ascertain by this means whether or not this would be a favorable place to establish his business. A traveler in Fiji recently photographed natives walking barefooted over red-hot stones. The hand of dry ferns about their ankles were not scorched.

Of the Good. John Ruskin, in counting up the blessings of his childhood, reckoned these three for first good: Peace—He had been taught the meaning of peace in thought, act and word; he had never heard father's or mother's voice once raised in any dispute, nor seen an angry glance in the eyes of either, nor had ever seen a moment's trouble or disorder in any household matter. Next to this he estimated Obedience; he obeyed a word or lifted a finger of father or mother as a ship her helm, without an idea of resistance. And, lastly, Faith; nothing was ever promised him that was not given; nothing ever threatened him that was not inflicted, and nothing ever told him that was not true.
