CHAPTER XI

Dennis was silent for a moment, then he said, the blood deepening in his face, "I want to say that, if it would not hurt Pauline terribly, I hope she would let me go."

"And you have been married only a few months," said Barbara.

"It doesn't take as long as a few months to discover a mistake."

"I think life is horrible," she said fiercely.

"It's horrible because we know we mustn't do the thing we want to do," Dennis agreed hoarsely.

"Because there is a so-called code of honour that says a man and a woman shall stick together no matter how much they hate each other."

Barbara cried out: "You couldn't hate her. Nobody could."

"No, no, I didn't mean that. She's one of the best--sweetest--"

"There was a long silence; then Barbara said suddenly: "When we say good-bye after this lunch, Dennis, it is to be good-bye."

His face flushed and his lips smothered.

"For Pauline's sake, or for mine, or for your own?" he asked.

Sudden tears started to her eyes. "The world is upside down," she said tremulously. "Only the other night I told Jerry Barnett that it was the end of romance when a man called a woman 'my dear,' but now you've said it seems to me like the very beginning."

"The beginning of a love that will never end," Barbara said.

"She drew her hand away. 'We're talking like a sentimental boy and girl,' she said. 'Ask for the bill, and let us go.'

"It was raining a little when they left.

"I'll take a taxi--don't wait," Barbara said.

"Do you imagine we are going to say good-bye like this?"

"Why not? It's as good a way as any."

"Not good enough for me."

The concierge had fetched a taxi, and Dennis and Barbara drove away together.

"I've never seen your home," Dennis said suddenly. "I've often tried to picture where you live."

"It wouldn't be to me. Let me come to your home, Barbara, just once."

"You won't be the first, Dennis. Jerry Barnett often comes."

"It makes no difference."

"Very well, your blood be on your own head."

But her heart beat with a happiness that was yet half pain. It was something to know he had once been in the rooms where she had dreamed of him so often; something to remember when all this foolishness was at an end.

"You'll hate it," she told him as they went up in the lift to her flat. "It'll be like me--as you thought I was when you first knew me."

She opened the door with her key. He followed her into the sitting room, and Barbara stirred the fire into a blaze and looked around her with critical eyes.

Hitherto she had been rather proud of her flat, with its queer coloring and very modern art-ficial or pretentious about him; he had come into her life like a fresh breeze into a stuffy, scented room, with which she knew she would never again be satisfied.

She sighed again and came back to the fire.

"Take off your coat, won't you? There's whisky on the sideboard, and cigarettes. Mix me a whisky, please."

She sat down in one of the big velvet chairs and leaned her head back, watching him with grave eyes. He looked so at home there in her sitting room, in spite of his tweed suit, which was oddly at variance with the surroundings; she looked somehow as if he belonged, the thought, and a little shiver of joy shook her as she realized how wonderful it would be if it was really his home as well as hers. If they had the right to shut the door on the world and be happy.

Unconsciously her eyes misted over as she looked at him. So dear! so beloved, but the husband of another woman.

Dennis came back with two whiskeys.

Barbara rose to her feet.

"I want to talk to you. No--stay there. It's nice respectable distance, please." She moved close to the fire and held her hands to its warmth.

Barbara had beautiful hands, slender and white, and suddenly Dennis found himself contrasting them with Pauline's.

Barbara went on after a moment in a brisk, unemotional voice.

Kindergarten Closing

A Garden of Children, Miss Berna Huestis' Kindergarten, closed yesterday with their happy little people all dressed in their Sunday best and in a setting of pretty spring flowers, sang, danced and played their way into the hearts of the large number of parents and friends. It was a very special occasion for these little people, who were carefully trained by their popular teacher, Miss Huestis and her assistant, Miss Gora Nicholson and has responded as only children can, when they are interested and happy in their work. After the program Mr. C. H. Black on behalf of the Directors congratulated Miss Huestis on her success in the past years and expressed the regret of all that she was severing her connection with the Kindergarten here. He wished her great happiness in the interesting event in which she was soon to participate. Miss Huestis replied very feelingly and received many happy congratulations and farewell remembrances from her little pupils. Owing to illness several of the children were regrettably absent.

Following was the program:

why her husband can't get along any better, nor why he can't make more money, nor why they can't have a new car, nor why she can't have a pink coat and real pearls. And after listening to the tale of her misfortunes the poor man feels as if a steam roller had passed over him and flattened him out. So he protects himself as best he can by taking refuge behind a barrier of silence. For, after all, a monologist runs down in time if nobody winds her up and gives her a fresh start by arguing with her.

UNINFORMED WIVES PREVENT HUSBANDS TALKING

(5) Other men are silent at home because they and their wives have ceased to speak the same language. The husbands have gone on reading and studying and improving their minds. Their wives have been too lazy to make the slightest effort at self-culture. They don't even read the daily papers or magazines, so they have nothing interesting and stimulating to discuss together. No man is inspired to waste a good story to a wife who never gets the point, or feels chatty when his audience never knows what he is talking about.

(6) Other men don't tell their wives anything that can help because their wives are leaky vessels that spill everything they know. They talk too much. They blab their husbands' business affairs to the general public and tell Mother and the girls, in strictest secrecy, about his plans and Mother and the girls do the further broadcasting.

(7) Many men do not talk at home because their wives never listen to them. When they try to discuss their business and talk shop, their wives yawn in their faces and show that they are bored to tears. They frankly tell their husbands that they don't consider them bulls of fire, and that they have heard their old stories a hundred times. They interrupt them in the midst of a discussion on what the world is going to be like after the war to ask if they remembered to order the coal, or to look at how cute the puppy is acting.

These are some of the reasons that men give for not talking at home. Maybe they've got something on the ball after all.
