MISS BROWN OF X. Y. O.

By E. Phillips Oppenheim (Copyright 1927 by E. Phillips Oppenheim)

AT A FEW minutes after 4 that afternoon, Miss Brown, piloted by the stalwart commissioner who had fetched her, mounted to the topmost floor of the great building in Whitehall, climbed the final flight of stairs and was ushered into the stronghold which had become Dessiter's temporary home. He welcomed her with a faint, mirthless smile.

"I haven't been feeling very well," she admitted. "You see, I was near enough—"

"News shaken up?" he inquired. He checked her kindly.

"I know all about it," he interrupted. "It was a very terrible affair. Now, will you open that packet upon the table?"

She gave a little cry. There it was, neatly tied up in brown paper, with a great red seal in one corner and a key in the string which she remembered perfectly well. She cut the fastenings at once with a pair of scissors which he handed to her. A single glance was sufficient.

"My book!" she exclaimed. "The real one! The letters are here, too, in the pocket!"

"It was handed over to an agent of mine an hour ago," she said. "The vaults were almost untouched. Do you feel like hearing exactly what did happen?"

"Please."

"It appears that as soon as the doors of the bank were opened, a man who had driven up in a taxi cab entered, with a check in one hand and a black bag in the other. He set down the check upon the counter, stooped down and opened the black bag, and threw three liquid bombs. There were seven clerks in the bank, four of whom were blown to pieces. The other three had marvellous escapes."

"Outside, two of my men were killed, four or five passersby and a boy on a bicycle. A number of other people were injured. The bank clerk who must have been in league with our friends was one of those who were killed."

"Barricades were put up around the building in a very short time, and a thorough investigation made among the debris. The vaults, were scarcely touched, and in an hour ago your packet was handed over to a representative of the Home Office."

Miss Brown asked only one question. "What became of the man who threw the bombs?"

"There wasn't enough left of him for identification," Dessiter replied dryly.

She drew off her gloves and fingered the book lovingly.

"Before you start," he said. "I was, one of the addresses I gave you."

She opened out the list, he looked over her shoulder and nodded thoughtfully, as he placed his forefinger upon one.

He crossed the room to the telephone and spoke for several minutes to an official at Scotland Yard. Then he returned to the table. Miss Brown had already removed her coat, hat and gloves and was seated before the typewriter.

"Any copies?" she asked.

"Two," he directed. "Don't hurry. You're as safe here as in the vaults of the Bank of England."

Miss Brown propped up her book, glanced through the first few lines, pushed back a somewhat refractory coil of her silky brown hair, lingered for a moment with her hands poised over the keys and then started upon her task.

Soon her fingers became the purely mechanical instruments of her will. Once more she passed into the wonderful world which she had envisaged so many times since that memorable night. She felt the amazing thrill of it, the palpitating records of journeyings undertaken under circumstances where escape from death seemed almost impossible.

One sentence in particular thrilled her again as it had done at the first dictation:

"It was my wish to have taken Benskopf alive, as he was reported to be in possession of the whole Chinese propaganda scheme bearing the official stamp of the Russian Government, and with special notes in the handwriting of a high official directing that Great Britain should be considered the chief enemy of the movement. The woman however, with whom I had danced a few minutes before was, as I had discovered then, armed, and Benskopf himself was drawing. I could have held him covered, but the woman would have dropped me. It was she who had killed the Frenchman, Mercier, who was reported to have committed suicide in the India House Hotel only the week before. I shot Benskopf, taking care to kill, and disarmed the woman only just in time. She tried the unusual tactics, and it took me an hour to maneuver her to the cafe in the square behind where I had a member of the—police waiting. The woman was one of the most dangerous agents of the society, and I handed to Sir E., our Minister, on the following morning proof of her identity and complicity in a list of crimes which he duly presented to the Government. Chiefly owing to the disorder in the city and to urgent representations from Sir E., the woman was shot on the following afternoon."

Miss Brown paused for a moment. She looked out at the high, uncurtained windows, so high that only the reflected glow of the city was visible in the clouds, and above, the stars.

These last few curt words which her fingers had struck into type haunted her. "The woman was shot on the following afternoon."

At his desk, with his profile turned to her, Dessiter was seated. She remembered his tone when he had dictated those few words, cold, unemotional, with a faint undertone of satisfaction as though with a task well accomplished. Miss Brown shuddered. She was doing her best to adapt herself to her new environment, but these things were not of the world in which she had lived.

"Getting on?" Dessiter asked without looking up.

She struck the keys once more. "Quite well," she answered. (To Be Continued.)

Went To Chair Still Protesting His Innocence

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 29.—Jerry Gedizium was electrocuted at the Charlestown state prison at 12.30 p. m. for the murder of Edward C. Ross, a Cambridge bank messenger.

Time will prove the truth of this, my dying statement."

Gedizium was escorted into the death chamber by two prison guards and by Rev. Fr. J. M. Murphy, chaplain at the prison. He repeated after the priest a prayer after he was strapped in the electric chair and the hood and electrodes adjusted. The current was turned on at 12.03 and he was pronounced dead seven minutes later, after three separate shocks, the first of 1,900 volts and the other two of 1,800 volts had been applied.

Greater Hospital Facilities Wanted

HALIFAX, Feb. 29.—The urgent demand for increased hospital space for tuberculosis patients at the Nova Scotia Sanatorium was stressed in the report of Dr. A. F. Miller, superintendent, in the annual report of that institution tabled in the Legislative Assembly this afternoon by Hon. G. S. Harrington, Minister of Public Works and Mines. Dr. Miller points out that last year there were 617 deaths in the province from tuberculosis, making the death rate 119 per 100,000, which is second highest of all provinces of the Dominion.

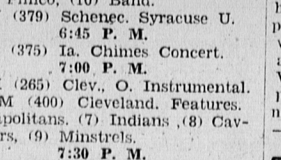

The Sanatorium treated 626 patients during the year, of which 507 were civilians and 119 ex-servicemen in the care of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Of the civilians, 85 were men and 81 women.

Dr. Miller lamented the lack of sufficient infirmary beds, which necessitated a long waiting list on which were patients to whom every delay lessened their chances of ultimate recovery.

of February, 16th as the radiant sun disappeared from view and darkness settled upon the earth it was discerned that the angel of death hovered about the above mentioned home. The Parish Priest Rev. Reginald F. MacDonald was summoned and administered the last solemn rites of the Catholic Church to a soul about to take its departure to another world within an hour. Wilbert's countenance assumed an Angelic smile, probably indicative of immediate entrance to the beatific vision and he closed his eyes in death to take his place, we hope, among the angelic choirs to sing the eternal alleluiahs.

By the death of this boy the Church lost a worthy and devout Altar boy, the home a noble son and brother, the community a model for boys.

At least according to worldly wisdom Wilbert's future seemed quite bright for his soul was enlivened with aspirations amazingly high for one of so tender years. Had he been spared there is no doubt that in manhood he would have been a credit to his church, a joy to his home and an example to the community.

His grief-stricken parents brothers and sisters have the sympathy of their many relations and friends this together with their minus illumined by faith, cognizant of the fact that God's ways, are not our ways, and influenced by the example and words of the eternal Master "not my will but thine be done" makes their hour of trial more easily endured.

Besides his parents he leaves to mourn their loss two brothers Sherman and Ralburn five sisters Margaret, Eleanor, Marion, Jean and Enid, an aged grandmother Mrs. Daniel Sullivan, Cape Wolf formerly of Hope River and a large number of other relatives and friends.

His remains accompanied by a very large concourse of people were conveyed to the immaculate conception Church Brae Lot 9, on the morning of February 18th where high mass of requiem was celebrated and absolution pronounced by the Pastor. Interment took place in the Parish Cemetery.

The pall bearers were Messrs Thomas Howard, Harold Howard, Lawrence Reilly, Peter Bulger, Leonard Stewart and Charles Stewart all cousins of the deceased.
