WELCOME THE TRAVELLER

(By ARTHUR HARDY)

Then this written in December, in the gloom of the year. "My credit in ruins. Welcome the Traveller run continuously at a loss. My capital almost at an end. Can see no hope for it but to sell the house, save what I can out of the ruins, and retire to Wood Farm, for the purchase of which for my son Robert I am now negotiating. As ever, Stephen Lawley, my friend. Shall get him to sell the house and all that is in it for me since in his hands I shall find no spite in the fall of the auctioneer's gravel. Wondering how long I shall be able to last into the new year. Have no taste for farming. Shan't last long at it; but what else is left for a weary traveller when he has reached the end of the long road but to lay down his tired frame and sleep."

Robert choked when he read that. In effect, Waterloo Berry died when he left Welcome the Traveller. His ghost must haunt the place even now, Bob thought.

Two months of the six had gone by, when, without warning, Peter Marlow vanished from Oldbeech House and Tansworth, and was seen there no more. The Eagle Film Company had abandoned the idea of establishing a film colony at Tansworth. Marlow had quarrelled with his directors and had resigned his position in the company. There were rumours of irregularities, but no proof. Oldbeech House was put up for sale, found few inquiries after it, and Adam Lawley, with customary shrewdness, snapped up the property at a bargain price.

"I'll find somebody who wants it," he told Robert, "and if ever you move into the Traveller and want that oak panelling you can have it."

In January negotiations between Danile Shelton and Johnny Morrissey ended in their settling terms and Robert Berry was definitely matched to fight Ben Brannock for the title of heavyweight champion of the world at Morrissey's Bowl on May 15th. Berry to receive sixteen thousand pounds free of tax plus his passage across the Atlantic and training expenses. The news thrilled Tansworth.

In addition Dan Shelton was engaged by Morrissey a promoter with an eye to the main chance, to box Ned Doherty ten rounds in a supporting contest. Dan to receive three thousand pounds.

The night the title fight was clinched Robert drove over to the Lawleys and dined there. After dinner he sat with Prunella in a room apart from the others. He had much to say to her.

"Whether I win this fight over the water, Prue, or not," he said, "I want you to marry me when I come back. And if everything goes well I shall want to buy the Buildings and reopen the Welcome the Traveller Inn. It's only fair to you to know that if you married me you might become the wife of an innkeeper."

Prunella smiled sweetly. Welcome the Traveller seemed to be calling with an insistent voice. She could not bear to think of Robert living there without her. Contentedly she nestled in his arms and sighed happily.

"Robert, dear," she whispered. "I will marry you if you want me."

CHAPTER XXV

BIG FIGHT FEVER

The Robert Berry party crossed the Atlantic on the Queen Mary. They numbered four, Daniel Shelton, Dan his son Andy Sagar, whose services were indispensable, and Robert Berry himself. But they were not the only Tansworth folk who sailed on the same ship; Tom Shulgrave went too; accompanied by half a dozen of his friends. Gardner, the boxing correspondent of the Daily Messenger, was also aboard, going to cover the fight for that newspaper.

The voyage was fast, only a little over the record. Newspapermen who had come out to meet the ship swarmed aboard from the tugs, eager to get the first word with Robert Berry and his manager. The great liner moved to her berth amid a welcoming scream of sirens, while Robert, leaning on the rail, stared at the magical scene before him, a panorama topped by towering skyscrapers.

Johnny Morrissey came aboard as soon as the gangways were in position, a vigorous, heavily built, square-shouldered, big-faced American between whose full lips was stuck a huge cigar. His hair was oily, black and curled amazingly. Rings of white gold in which diamonds flashed, circled his fat fingers. Eyebrows like brushes, eyes blue and piercing. One look at Robert Berry and he clutched the boxer's hand in a grip that hurt.

"Glad to meetcha," he boomed, running his gaze up and down the Englishman. "You're bigger than I thought, Bob, and you step like a cat. That means speed in the ring. You got an iron jaw, eh? Looks like Brannock won't have a walk-over. And this is your manager. How do Daniel. This your son Dan? Glad to know yer, Dan. They say you are dandy with your fists but you'll need to protect that bad lamp of yours if you don't want Ned Doherty to do the same McGinty did to you. Its a pity McGinty hit the slide so early for he looked like cleaning up the heavy weight camp once, and now he's only a ham fighter."

It was an early April day without a cloud in the sky, scarcely a breath of wind stirring, and a warmth as of June to set the blood stirring. The great towers of the skyscrapers shone like burnished metal in the blinding light.

"Why, it's baking hot, Morrissey," said Daniel. "I hope the fine weather lasts until after the fight so that you may pack a big gate in the Bowl."

"The good weather will last," predicted Morrissey, with a brisk nod. "And the crowd is as good as there. A quarter of the tickets have been sold already. And as it's likely to stay hot around Noo York I've got a furnished house for you at Providence Bay. You'll have sea air as well as privacy and a big park to run around in. There's a gym and a boxing stage and all the gear you'll need out there, and I've engaged a staff to look after you. I've fixed Delaney Wally Snood and Puncher Riley to help Barry and Dan in their training. There's two automobiles for you to ride in, though I guess you won't want to come to Noo York until it's almost time to fight. Let's go and chew something, and then I'll drive you out to the Bay and show you around."

"That sounds princely, John," said Daniel Shelton. "But what's it going to cost me and the boys?"

"Not a nickel. Forget it," Morrissey sliced the air with the side of a fat hand. "What's it matter if it does cost me a dime or two more, I want to stage the best fight ever, see? I'll get all my dough back and then some when Robert fights on the 15th."

The long drive out to Providence Bay was a sheer pleasure on such a lovely day. They arrived at the house at five o'clock. It was an imposing mansion containing over twenty rooms and five bathrooms. Standing on a rise, it overlooked the sea and the grounds were finely wooded. Everything a boxer needed for his preparation for a fight was there. The staff had lined up before the porchway entrance to greet them. The luggage was tumbled out of the spare car that followed. A fleet of other cars which came racing up poured out reporters and cameramen who had come in chase.

It took time before Robert and Dan were able to settle down to their training; but the moment they had got used to the change of air and its dry tonic effect, they began to work in real earnest.
