Hunter's Corner

Others like to cut them up and after seasoning the rabbit well with pepper and salt roll them in flour and bread crumbs and fry them well in deep fat. This rabbit prefers to place the meatiest portions, such as the hind quarters and the best cuts of the back, into a pot with lots of vegetables and after this concoction has simmered for several hours add some old fashioned dumplings. The resultant stew is something that will stick to your ribs and cause you to pass the bowl for the second helping.

There are others among the sporting fraternity who refuse to eat rabbit no matter in what form it is dressed up and whose interest in this animal is centered solely in the sport afforded in hunting it. I find that the flavour is improved if one cuts a slit in the belly immediately after the rabbit is shot and removes the intestines and stomach. A rabbit during the winter months feeds almost exclusively on browse in the form of birch and maple buds, twigs of poplar, willow and juniper, etc., and if the stomach happens to be punctured by the shot pellets it sometimes gives the meat a "brossey" flavour.

The rabbit is one species of game that doesn't worry when the snow drifts pile up. Their hind feet, equipped with natural snow shoes carries them over even the deepest and fluffiest snow with ease, where other animals less fortunately equipped flounder in drifts over their backs. In fact the rabbit welcomes deep snow at times for it takes them within range of the juiciest twigs and buds that ordinarily are several feet out of reach. When hovering zero laden billiards sweep the forests and swamps the rabbits burrow down through the snow and find a cozy spot amid the buried spruce twigs. If hunter bothers them they only have to stick out their necks and nibble at some spruce needles or bark.

Sportsmen are beginning to wake up to the value of our rabbits both as a source of sport and of food — and it's about time they received the proper attention. This subject will be touched upon at a later date.
