Chapter XXIII

Kitty, seated opposite him in the speakeasy, was a small steel structure covered with fluff. Like Sierra and the Charlottetown, she took from a fellow some of his right to exist. They did not achieve it by doing but, rather, by being. These terrible three! The terrific vitality of the three in Twenty-one East! By their very existence they made a man feel as if he were standing on a siding while an express train roared past, leaving him wind-blown and breathless. They were the most exciting women he had ever known. Br-r-r!

What apollis had Kitty brought home now? A new dancing team for the Charlottetown to exploit into fame? Trained falcons for ladies to wear on their wrists? "What is it, Kitty?" he asked across the table. "An opal tiara for fat Mrs. Opdike? Invisible lorgnettes for nearsighted dowagers?"

"No although I have an idea for divisible ones that fold to the size of a five-cent piece. But this time, Ollie, my suave and satin one, it is something I've wanted for eight years!"

"Could it be me?"

"It could, Ollie, and is, only you're so darned taken."

His entire face jumped at that as if of a nervous contraction, and she hurried on, as abashed as he was stunned at having been rudely stepped on where he was so cruelly vulnerable. "It's something I've connived for, screwed for, prayed for and, believe me, paid for, in tears of boredom. It happened today. Maty Dowling's stepmother, you know, the hardware millions one—

"—who took you to California last year—"

"Precisely. That was part of my groundwork. Part of the tears of boredom. She's going to finance me in the dream of my life."

"That Kitty Mullane, Incorporated idea of yours?"

"Exactly! Kitty Mullane, Inc. Caterers to Connoisseurs. Dealers in authentic. Will supply anything from pigeon blood to pigeon-blood troubles to Corvairs, Belts, sturgeon, Currier and Ives, Spode, planked steaks, Maltese crosses, Angora cats, aquamarines and marine models. Merchants in Beauty. Perhaps that's why I wanted you to be first to share my news. You classify under authentic beauty, Ollie. Long graceful, smooth, almondlike."

He preferred the Leonora brand of flattery. Kitty, fluff as a puff, nevertheless made it sound patronizing. She said it through her sharp appraising eyes. Her lips blowing it to him as she blew smoke through her flaring nostrils which, he always fancied, she rouged to make them fine-fetted. Shifting, he cut a canape of foie gras with his fork. "Why shouldn't an old potato like Marion Dowling be glad to back a smart girl like you with a couple of million?"

"Don't be silly. She's backing me for exactly thirty-five thousand, which makes her my loquacious silent partner, on the well-known fifty-fifty basis."

"Do you think she could be induced to turn over her share of the large profits to a certain poor devil of a roller-top desk slave, whose stepmother's husband mistakes him for the office boy?"

"No, but I could be induced to turn over mine, Ollie—and I would—and I'd love it over and above the telling—"

He looked quickly into her face, ready to match her quizzical eyes with his own, but stopped at what he saw there. The woman wanted to marry him, even as he could have sworn, with his intuition, that Sierra and the Charlottetown had at least speculated on such a possibility. As Kitty leaned across the table he was like a lad who did not like fruit, holding his hat for the winter apples that would be shaken from the tree.

"Oliver, we're free, white, and considerably over twenty-one. I'm by way of getting almost everything I want. Marry me, Oliver, and make it all of what I want. We two can make quite ago of it."

He thought vaguely as he recollected in his spirit: How fantastic that he, Oliver Plow, lap dog, office boy, fourth hand at bridge, was by way of refusing to marry Kitty Mullane for no reason except that men didn't choose to marry lady hounds out of efficiency centers. They just didn't choose, not even those like himself, with practically all to gain and so very little to lose. "You're putting me in a devil of a spot, Kitty. I admire you so much, but—how can I—a fellow—like me—Kitty, I can't. Not you. How can I—"

She placed her mauve paw over his. "By not explaining, Ollie. I was prepared to lose. I think you're an unutterable ass to pass me up, but let's not be tragic about it. It's all in a day's work. All right?"

"You're magnificent."

"My, my! Magnificent, am I? well, well, just see where it's got me!"

Occasionally, when the sun poured down upon the supine city and though the stifling nights bricks and asphalt remained hot to the touch, Sierra found herself asking herself why, with the exception of a weekend with her father and

Leonora at the Adirondack camp, she alone had chosen to remain in town throughout a summer of relentlessly unbroken heat.

In the midst of a highly profitable enterprise of a Diet and Reducing Farm in eastern Maine, which they had leased from a defunct prize fighter who had used it as training quarters, the Charlottetown and Kitty wrote frequently, describing the pleasant room awaiting her in an annex cottage, well removed from the score or so of beauty seekers who paid fabulously in order to be deprived of the luxuries of diet and surroundings.

"Come up here," wrote the Charlottetown, "and see how they love to pay for what they could have at home, free, for nothing, but prefer to come to us and have it packed for them at five hundred a week. We do it by way of early to bed and early to rise, Pine Woods. No food with their meals.

Fruit juices. The massage, the thermal baths, the needle showers are the fancy but unnecessary addenda which go with the expensive packaging. Be that as it may, they leave here feeling like a million dollars, which makes the five hundred a week a modest enough rate. Kitty Shylock Mullane would raise it to twice that if I'd let her. As it is, it's a shame to take the money."

that he is a very remarkable man, and if he had his dues he would be president of the bank or running the government. He doesn't want a girl to get out a brass band every time he takes her out, but he does want her to show that she is having a good time and that it is all due to him.

And every husband would forgive his wife every other fault under the sun if she would just show him how she appreciates how hard he works and how generous he is to her and the children.

Of course, men admire beauty in women, but if a girl is feminine and sweet and amiable and keeps a man entertained and jollies him along she can get along with a very small amount of pulchritude, for any girl looks good to a man who handles him with tact and says "thank you" prettily.

NEW WAY OF WASHING ENDS DIRTY SOAP SCUM

Soap scum "locks" dirt and grease into fabrics, stiffens fibres so they wear out sooner! It can't all be rinsed out, even in hottest water!

Surf makes no scum, takes out any soap scum left from earlier washings! Fabrics stay strong! Washes are whiter, brighter, SWEETER! ... "Surf-clean!"

ORDINARY CLEAN

"SURF-CLEAN"

You'll boast about your sparkling "Surf-clean" wash—the whitest, brightest clothes you ever saw! But that's not all! "Surf-clean" means sweeter, too... sweeter 3 ways:

1. Surf dissolves clinging, greasy dirt... in a flash!
2. Surf ends your soap scum problem for good.
3. Surf removes germs, deodorizes.

You get mountains of rich, long-lasting suds! Hard-working suds. Why, ounce for ounce, Surf does 3 times the work of leading washday soaps—in hardest water! Think what you save!

But best of all—Surf does all your washing... greasy work clothes, the youngster's grimy play suits. It's safe for delicate silks, nylons, rayons, household linens and curtains—even the walls and woodwork! And Surf gets dishes sparkling clean without wiping.

Try Surf in your washing machine—find out why it's more popular than any washing product introduced in Canada in years! Get the attractive blue box at your grocer's... For a shorter-SWEETER washday story use Surf.

Not only whiter, brighter but "Fresh-air-Fresh" even when dried indoors

If it's "Surf-Clean"... It's really Clean
