Ellen's Diary

(Continued from page 2) Sometimes that life is largely a game of chance, if we are left alone to play it. Or maybe it's a game of cards. Then as I think of it, I'm fortunate when the cards are taken from us and another plays our hand. These good Bracides take to a broader life than that enjoyed on a farm, broader in the sense of not being isolated for if I desired, life on a farm can be lived fairly well to oneself. They go to keep a country store, an interesting life and very closely bound-up with that in the surrounding farming-community. The country store has been termed—not inaptly the pulse of the community. It is often a meeting-place where community doings are intelligently and very wisely discussed and settled. Work, affairs, births, deaths and marriages—vital statistics—are bound to be noted there. Now, if the lady would only keep a record, what realms of interest she might write! But James points out: "She'll be a busy woman." I know. Once I kept store for a few days I merely made change. I let the customers, more accustomed to the store than I, help themselves. Sort of on their honor, they were. It must have been a good plan to follow, for as yet there is no sign of that firm "breaking-up."

There are callers this evening, other farmers. Following lunch, I listened to their chat. Seasonal work. Small mention of grain notes, other than the yield. The potato season is here. When some one says "they are those in Bracides digging" James said: "Ours are not entirely dead." It will be some days yet before we commence that work, I hope so. There are other neglected things to do. And the days grow shorter, less time for field-work. And the evening's lengthen. But our company has gone and if we plan to attend a party tomorrow evening, there should be a lengthy rest-to-night. Until tomorrow — Diary—Good-night.

Mrs. M. McLeod's Saturday evening met a typical Chicago gangster. "We just do our job," "Huh," said the gangster, "so you are one of those tough guys from Scotland Yard?" "Smash you up," was the prompt reply. Inspector Thompson retired from the police force on pension in 1936, but soon after the war began he rejoined the special branch at Scotland Yard. He is tall, clean-shaven, dark-haired and carries an umbrella on almost all occasions.
