PREPARING LAND FOR THE ROOT CROPS

In the Old Country, where the root crop is the mainstay of the live stock industry, the chief farm work in the fall is the plowing and manuring of the field, in the year crop rotation on the farm, that is to grow the roots. The whole year's manure is drawn to this field and the thorough cultivation the soil gets, along with the manure, lays the foundation for the coming year's rotation of grain and hay. Where this preparation is not made, mangels and turnips do not bear a heavy crop.

Many of the comparative root crop failures is insufficient preparation of the soil before the crop is planted. On a great many farms, roots are sown on timothy sod land and precede grain. Too often in the cultivation of such land, the requirements of the crop are lost sight of, with the result that the roots are sown on spring ploughed sod, where it is next to impossible to secure a proper seed bed.

For their proper growth and development, root crops require a deep, mellow, fertile seed bed, free from weeds. This is especially true of mangels which have a strong tap root and require their nourishment farther down in the soil than swedes. Roots will not thrive on weedy ground and efforts made to control the weeds while the plants are small often result in as much damage to the crop itself as to the weeds. It is well therefore, to control them before the crop is planted and the best time for this work is during the summer or fall previous to sowing. This is especially true of the land intended for mangels.

For the best results, sod land intended for roots should be ploughed in August, as soon as the hay is removed. It should be top-worked at intervals until fall to control grass and weeds. For the best results, this work should be done during hot, dry weather. All root crops are heavy feeders and require plenty of plant food in the soil. They may be grown on light or heavy soils with good results, provided they receive proper fertilizing and care. Splendid crops may be grown with baryard manure alone, applied at the rate of 18 or 20 tons per acre. If the manure is available it should be spread in the fall and ploughed deep into the soil. Ploughing the manure down in the fall gives it a chance to rot and prevents loss of fertility. On the average farm, however, there is seldom manure enough available at that time of the year and the farmer has to depend on what is produced during the winter, which may be applied on the snow or, better still, it may be stacked and applied in the spring. Fresh green manure is not a suitable fertilizer for roots, therefore the manure for this crop should be piled up or applied as early in the winter as possible. This should be ploughed down in the spring to a depth of six or seven inches in order to secure a deep mellow seed bed.

Another very important thing which the careful farmer should carry forward as rapidly as possible is that of keeping his family and his live stock out of the mud. Nothing adds to the drudgery and annoyance of winter chores as having to wade through mud during the fall and spring, and stock cannot do well where such conditions obtain.

Cement walks should be built from the house to the barn and to all the other buildings. If too one in cold water quickly, put in a paper bag, twist the bag tight and put it in the oven.

When peeling onions there be no tears if the onion is held the hand with sprout end up root down.

Do not forget the water supply during the winter month. If the tanks are leaking, they should be drained and cleaned and the leak located. A little roofing mastic forced into the crack or hole will usually stop the leak. If the pump does not operate properly now is the time to take it apart and repair the trouble. Outside and in general level with field stones, gravel. The barn lot should be drained and all roof water away so it will not produce a few inches of gravel will be wonderfully in keeping down the gravel can even be used in hog yard if wire fencing is fastened down and then covered with the gravel.
