"A rolling pin is no good to an igloo dweller—she can never get her husband cornered."

FICKLE

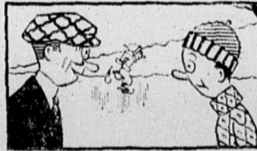

In summer time I think we'd prize a snowbank clear up to our eyes. But when we get it, I'm afraid, we sigh for ninety in the shade.

"Wisdom comes too late to be of much use." "And by the time your lungs are developed you are too big to cry."

Mrs. A.: Do you ever give your husband Christmas hints? Mrs. B.: Of course I do. Mrs. A.: Do you? Why the least hint makes my husband so mad. Mrs. B.: Poor dear, you don't know the combination. I tell my husband I don't want what I want and then I get it.

"I notice Jack always speaks well of himself." "Yes, he says that his friends will tell the bad about him."

COLDS

Here's how most people avoid them At the first sign of a cold coming on, take two Groves' Laxative Bromo-Quinine Tablets. Then take two more every two or three hours. More people, by millions, check and prevent colds this way than by any other method.

Its popularity comes from its merit!

Grove's Laxative BROMO-QUININE Tablets Auction Sale of Horses Have ear of good horses to be sold at Auction at McNell's Livery Stable, Summerside, on Tuesday, December 30th. The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"All very fine; we know what talk of that kind means. How am I to hold up my head among my neighbours after this? I'll leave you, that's what I'll do; leave you to grub along here as best you can. The children can make their choice. I'll keep Tom and Bee—Mary, I've no doubt, will stop with you. She's your kidney. Has she anything to do with this? Has she, out of revenge being taken away from Mardoche, egged you on to offer me this humiliation?"

"Whesht, lass, you've beaded yourself! Mary has had no hand in it. She doesn't even know. I've kept it to myself these three days." "I don't wonder you were afraid to tell what you'd done. It's a crime, Bob Freeland, that's what it is. Do you mean to say you went deliberately to Manchester for the purpose of betraying us like that?"

"I had other business in Manchester, but that was the most important. I went to discuss the matter with the man that was kept on it, and settled it before we parted. It's to one of the Lays. I've sold it. They were desperately keen to keep the place in the family."

"And came home here and carried on as if nothing had happened, yet they say the Scotch are true as steel. I've no use for them—I'll never forgive you, Bob Freeland. Please go away and leave me, and shut the door."

Freeland made no effort to move. Her voice had become shrill and high-pitched, and in the room below they were soon made aware that something unusual was taking place. "Mother's got her wool off, Molly," said Bee, looking up from her stringing of some Venetian beads, following on the finishing of her hat-trimming. It was always something vivid and attractive, something for personal adornment which occupied Bee's fingers, and her occupation usually suited her style.

Mary made no answer. She was thinking the same thing, and her face saddened. She hated the scenes which she knew often occurred between her father and mother, chiefly because they always left some new lines, or at least deepened the old ones on her father's face.

What is to be done in homes where conflicting tempers rage, where all the members are in bondage to one? It is a problem as old as the everlasting hills, and even the grace of God, exercised by those who have to live in such conditions, does not remove the cross.

"I'll let you out when I've explained the situation, and I'll do now, once and for all," said Freeland in a steady voice which had perceptibly hardened. "The man that was kept on the place, as I say, is a Lacy, one of the old stock. No, I don't know where he came from. It was no business of mine to inquire. And he had got the determination and the feeling which we'd never get, Harriet, thought we lived in the place till the day of our death, that it belongs to his name and race. He was prepared to table any money to keep it in the family. He has got the money."

"Then I hope you made him pay for his fancy," burst from her lips, the commercial instinct asserting itself even in spite of her rage. "I made a thousand pounds on the deal. That's yours, Harriet—to do what you like with. He paid the full price and over, far more than the place is worth; so that's that! But while I was glad to humour the man, who seemed to think of the place as if it was his religion, that wasn't the sole reason. It was a mistake, judged from every standpoint, for me to let you persuade me against my better judgment. This is not the time for men like me, who have made money out of the war, against their will, to be making a parade of it. It's the kind of thing that is going to hasten the revolution they're eye talking about, and it is coming, sooner or later. I got some proof of that this very night from the Basin."

"The Basin!" echoed Mrs. Freeland with a scorn that could hardly be uttered. "So it is the Basin that dictates your line of action now. It just shows what you sprung from. If the revolution is coming, will you lead the Basingfold section of it then, and in this the preliminary? Are you going to divide the spoils with the spoilers first, and then set out to break up England? So that's all your mother's prayers and psalm-singing has brought you to!" They were trying words for a man to listen to, and Freeland bit his lips. "Look here, Harriet, you and me haven't hit it off very well, especially of late years. I've done my best, but I've failed. I've given in to you a lot, when perhaps it would have been better had I stood out. But this is not a little thing. It's a big thing—an affair of conscience."

"The Nonconformist conscience," she sneered.

But he passed the jibe unheeded. "I am willing to please you in everything I can, but I must reserve my judgment on the things that really matter. This is one. It was wrong to buy Gorham Lacy; the most foolish imagination on earth to think that we can alter the whole conditions of life by merely moving into a big house, and calling our selves by this name or that. I've made up my mind to bide in this house where I've lived and where the balms were born. They've no fault to find with it, and we'll be happier, Harriet, if you make up your mind to that, and try to make the best of it."

She answered him not at all. All these arguments he had marshalled before, and she imagined she had disposed of them in the discussion when she had urged and at last persuaded him to the purchase of the estate.

"I'm sorry for you, lass, and I wish I'd been stronger a while back, before things went so far. But this is a good place to live in, and we can have happy days in it yet. And if it's power and place you're after, I'll take on the Mayor's job this year. They've been at me this very day. A deputation came over to the mill at five o'clock this afternoon."

"And this is the first I've heard of it!" she said scathingly. "I put it to you—is there any chance of a woman being happy with a man who tells her nothing, either about his public or private affairs? I'm sick of it. Go Ga away! I tell you—go away!"

He saw that further discussion was futile at the moment, and opened the door. He paused hesitatingly for an instant, wondering whether it was any use further explaining or protesting, but when she threw herself, all dressed as she was, on the bed, careless of rumpling the lace bedspread over the underlip of pink silk she closed the door softly and went downstairs. Entering the living-room once more, he looked round vaguely. (To be Continued)

CANADA IS IN NEED OF ART DEVELOPMENT

OTTAWA, Dec. 26, Canada must look to developing art if it is to develop a great nationality, says Eric Brown, director of the National Gallery here. In a recent address on "Art and the National Gallery," he remarked that no great country has existed without a corresponding great art. Still another pointed assertion was "the greatest periods in the history of a country are coincident with development of its highest form of art."

Mr. Brown held there was no heavy mystery enshrouding art except that which people themselves created. Undoubtedly the artist was more sensitive to impressions than the ordinary individual and interpreted nature differently. The finest revelation of this fact was that given by Turner when complained he could not see the color or beauty in that great English artist's work. "But don't you wish you could?" "Never had replied."

Tracing the historical connection between the plunatic periods in a nation's life and its art, Mr. Brown cited the cases of Italy, Holland, Spain and England to show they developed simultaneously. The true English school without any of the Tudor influences, tury and lasted until the death of Turner.

Of existing conditions in the art world, the speaker contended there was nothing new in the quarrel of the different schools. A change was going on in Canada—a drifting from the photographic to influences and impressions. To demonstrate the antagonism which persisted in all artistic changes, he recalled the disturbances created by Manet and his impressionist school of 1860 in Paris. The work of the National Gallery of Canada, Mr. Brown said, rested in the acquisition of valuable works and the encouragement of a true Canadian art. In the latter field, the Gallery sent out a large number of exhibitions yearly and was active in many others of national and international character.
