SANDRA THE JEALOUS

By Jane Phelps

MORE ABOUT LEOLA.

CHAPTER XXI.

"From that time we quarreled constantly," Everett went on in the same repressed tones. "Yet often after our fiercest quarrels we would give voice to our love for each other just as fiercely. Leola was the most beautiful woman I have ever known. Also, the quickest to take offense. She could not brook restraint. Instead of trying to prevent my jealousy, she laughed at it and deliberately did things to arouse it. Things I—no man in love can endure with calmness. But Leola was just as proud as she was reckless. I threatened to divorce her. We had been at the seashore for several weeks. That night she ran away and—drowned herself. Her body was not found for hours. But that we kept secret, no one knows she was a suicide—no one but me.

"I beg you will not speak to anyone of her—Leola. We were not lying here when it happened. I had taken her away some time before in the hope that she would be kinder to me. I have intended to tell you of her, but I cannot talk of her calmly even yet—no I wait!"

"That 'yet' hurt me. I had felt a certain relief when he said she was dead. But—he still loved her, or—did he? I must find out.

"Leola was twenty-eight when she left me—nine years ago," he added, after a few moments—"it seems like yesterday," again he seemed to be unaware of my presence as he said the last few words.

"I could keep still no longer. This Leola had been dead nine years yet he still grieved over her. I gathered my courage to ask:

"If you were so unhappy with her, why did you want to get married again, why?" he interrupted, again seemingly forgetting to whom he was talking. "I never shall know what it means to be happy—"

"This time it was I who interrupted.

"Why did you marry me?" I asked excitedly. He was hurting me too dreadfully.

"Yes—you have a right to ask that too. I was attracted to you from the first. You are very like Leola in coloring. She had just that wonderful hair—that you have. But I had no thought then of marrying again. But you seemed to like me, to enjoy being with me. I saw the simple way you had been brought up. The kind of parents you had. You would be a wholesome woman. You had none of the diabolical fascinations some women possess. But you would make a good wife and mother. I want such a wife, and I want children. If you are what you promise to be we will be happy together. Now please leave me alone. I am very tired tonight—I have had a hard day. And this has been hard for me as well as for you. Before you go there is just one thing I want to say. Never as long as we live together mention—her to me again. I have been perfectly honest with you; have told you all there is to tell. Never speak of what I have confided to you if you value my—love," he had hesitated just a second before the last word. "Now, good-night."

I was dismissed. Yet at the moment my principal feeling was one of compassion for the man who sat before the grate fire, who had covered his eyes with his hands when he stopped speaking, and who had seemingly forgotten that I existed.

The revulsion came when I reached my room. It was still early and bed seemed a far possibility. My brain was boiling with what I had just heard. I must think, think.

One thought seemed to stalk more boldly than the rest through my mind: "Everett still loved that beautiful woman who once had been his wife—that Leola." Young as I was, I realized the passion in his voice when he spoke of her. Never had it been there for me. But I was his wife! No one, not even Leola could take that from me. And he was a widower so could rightfully marry me. My mind fairly reeled with thoughts that pressed down upon it. But it was not until worn out by my emotion, sick at heart because although he was my husband Everett loved a dead woman; that the reason for his marrying me came over me in all its—to me—stark loveliness. He had married me because he thought I would make a good wife and mother. How dreadful! Not because he loved me; but for those other reasons. He didn't think me attractive enough to make him jealous if I did have hair like hers, like Leola. I tore at my heavy braids until I hurt myself so I was obliged to stop or cry out with pain. I hated my hair! I would have it dyed, or I would cut it off! It was because my hair was like hers he had been attracted to me. He didn't love me at all. He never had.

I do not think that up to that night in the library when he told me of his love for Leola that I was at all in love with Everett. I had admired him, been flattered by his attentions and his gifts. But now there suddenly dawned the thought that I loved him at the same moment I decided that he cared nothing for me. It was torture.

Long afterward I knew that Everett had not quite realized how cruelly he had told his story. Not in the words, perhaps, but in the tones of his voice, and in his almost whispered words when he seemingly forgot that I was his wife. That he was talking to me—that I had married him and couldn't get away, but must bear whatever he chose to put upon me to bear. And I must bear it alone. Neither to him or to any other could I speak of what I felt sure would entitle me to my life, my happiness.

"If he only had told me before we were married," I groaned, then realizing that had he, I never should have married him. And he wouldn't have had a "good wife and children."

NEW HAVEN RECEPTION.

On the night of July 18—the New Haven neighbors of Ptes. Daniel Darrah and Joseph Nolan assembled in the public hall to welcome them back to their home district which they left over a year ago to don the khaki. The hall was beautifully lighted and decorated for the occasion. On the motion of Mr. James Tierney and with the hearty approval of all present, Mr. Angus McPhee was appointed to perform the duties of chairman. On rising Mr. McPhee said that he was very glad to see such a large audience before him, which showed that the people, though no doubt tired of "war and rumors of war," were ready and eager to pay their respects to our returning boys. In concluding Mr. McPhee said that the people of New Haven might well be proud of their sons. Two sleep 'neath the sod in Flanders and eleven have returned home.

Mr. Malcolm McKinnon, Churchill, made an excellent speech, and at a late hour delighted the audience with a comic recitation.

The two brave lads were then called to the platform and an address of welcome to them was read by Miss Tierney and Mr. Cavanagh presented both boys with a gold ring each. In a few well chosen words they thanked their friends and neighbors for their kindness and said that they would always hold these gifts as a proof of New Haven generosity and as souvenirs of the great war.

Messrs. Curley and McKaig gave a ten-minute exhibition of scientific boxing which was greatly enjoyed by the audience.

The young ladies in a short time prepared a sumptuous repast for all the soldiers present and other prominent citizens.

After the tables had been cleared away the young folks decided to trip the light fantastic and the hall was soon cleared of chairs and seats to agree with their wishes.

Messrs. McCaughey, Graves and Buchanan were the musicians and ably performed their duties.

For two hours or so this pleasant
