York?" I asked fatuously. Her eyes danced with a glint of humor.

"Pray, sir, will thee be any other shipping-place in the ocean?" I laughed.

"My name," I began--and then I stopped abruptly.

My name at present was William Juggins, and I had a feeling of reluctance at practicing deceit upon this girl at our first meeting. But she saved me from my quandary. "You will not be what you seem, sir," she said gravely. "That I can see, and perhaps you will not think me indiscreet if I say so much."

"This true," I assented eagerly. "Indeed--"

"But you will be meeting my--" she hesitated ever so little--"my father presently, no doubt, and he will make us known to one another. Now I must go on deck."

And she walked by me with a faint swish of skirts that sounded like an echo of far-off fairy music.

Her father! Who could he be? And then realization smote me.

Plainly, she could not be De Veulle's daughter--nor Captain Abbot's. She was Murray's Murray's daughter? I rebelled against the idea. It could not be. It ought not to be. What right had he to a daughter--and such a maid as this? 'Twas absurd! Manifestly absurd!

Why, I must hate the man. I had no other recourse. And he had a daughter! And above all, this daughter!

When I came on deck the next morning we were driving down-channel before a smart northwest wind. Murray stood by the weather rail with the negro, who I learned afterward was called Tom, at his elbow. As I emerged from the companionway Tom leaned forward and whispered something to his master. Murray walked straight across the deck to my side, his eyes fastened upon my face.

"How now, Master Juggins," he said heartily, his hand outstretched, "and did you leave your good uncle or is it cousin?"

I perceived that he took me for the lout I was dressed to represent, and strove to play up to the disguise. "Well enough, sir," I answered

She regarded me gravely, evidently puzzled by the incongruousness of my voice and my plowboy garments.

"You are never Scots, sir?" she answered finally.

"No, but I know Scotland." A light dawned in her eyes with the words.

"Ah, then you will be knowing the song that I sang! Lochaber No More," 'tis called, and a bitter lament of exiles out of their own homeland."

"No, I never heard it before--but I have a brother buried on a hill-side far north of Lochaber, in the Clan Donald country."

The sorrow that came into her face was beautiful to see. None but a person who had Gaelic blood could have sympathized so instantly and so generously with a stranger's grief.

"That will have been the great sadness upon you," she cried in the odd way that the Highland Scots have of using English. "Oh, sir, 'Oh, sir, your woe will have been deep! So far from his own home!"

"Yes," I assented; "and he an exile, too."

"An exile!" She leaned toward me, her eyes like stars.

"You will be one of the good People!"

I did not answer her, too confused in my wits to know what to say; and suddenly my confusion spread to her.

"It is wild I am talking, sir!" she exclaimed. "Never heed my words. Sure, who would be trusting his heart's blood to the stranger that stepped in his path?"

"I think I would trust mine to you," I answered boldly.

She smiled faintly.

"From your manner you would be no Englishman, sir, saying such pretty things without consideration." "I have been long out of England."

"Then your sorrow will not be so great for parting with all you have held dear. Lucky is your lot."

"You have never been to America?" I asked.

"I had never been out of Scotland until I came south to take ship today. Ah, sir, there is a great sorrow at my heart for the country I love."

We said nothing while you might have counted ten, and in the silence she looked away from me.

"And you go with us to New

French grape vines, unable to withstand the cold nights of Brittany, eventually caused the industry to disappear.

Ten years ago Professor Daniel decided to seek a solution. He found it by marrying French to American vines, and the resultant hybrid produces a satisfactory wine, containing about 10 percent alcohol.

Professor Daniel visited the United States five years ago to study the American vine. He brought samples with him and started experimenting. He found the American vines immune to phylloxera. The American stalks were rugged enough to resist the Atlantic winds that sweep Brittany and their marriage with French vines produced an excellent wine.

French grape growers now suggest to American vineyard keepers that the same marriage can be made to work in America. Fine plants from the Sauterne, Anjou, Beauce, Margaux and Graves regions could be grafted to American roots in fairly warm regions and America could produce the same high quality wines which have until now been a French monopoly.

RENNES, March 5. (U. P.)--Dry America is furnishing the grapevines with which Brittany is being successfully converted into a wine-growing province, it was announced by Professor Lucien Daniel, of the University of Rennes.

In the days of Robespierre, the praises of Breton wines were sung by bards, but the fragile nature of having recently published a Royal Order providing funds for the investigation committee to continue its studies during the first quarter of 1931.

The appropriation is not a large one--6,000 pesetas for the study of the geological aspects of the problem and 6,500 for investigations relative to the proposed railroad tunnel. Besides there is an appropriation of 1,500 pesetas for the author of the proposed project--Colonel Pedro Jevencio.

The commission which nearly two years ago was enchanted with the study of the project is composed of Jevencio, Luis de la Pena, Enrique Dupuy, de Lome, Jose Serra, Nicholas Prat, Gonzalo Torres Polanco, Rafael de Buen and Juan Gavala.
