A THOUGHT FOR THE DAY
The little cares of yesterday
Now seem so far away,
As I stand upon the threshold
Of a glad new day.
With fresh courage in my heart
I shall not let my eyes
To waste the sun in splendour
Starts to banish the eastern skies.
The sweet fresh air of early dawn
Shall cleanse my heart of every fear
How answers words of comfort
Into my waiting ear.
And standing at the threshold
Of Day's open door
I shall not waste a single thought
On troubles gone before.
But I shall walk with perfect trust,
And never, never stray
From him who holds within His hand
The pattern of my day.
—Constance I. Heckbert.

MY BOTANY DAY

Years ago, when I first became interested in the study of botany, I used to plan to set aside July 1st, the Dominion Day holiday, for a long walk in the country. I called that "Botany day." The object of this walk was not to seriously study botany nor anything else in particular, but just to ramble out and enjoy the sight of the flowers that were in bloom, and of course also any birds I happened to see. Simply to revel in the out-of-doors.
My walk on this occasion usually led through a lovely wooded valley where the tall pines shaded a clear stream curving among its grassy banks. Then I came out on to broad flowery meadows which covered the rolling country, and finally to a small reedy pond that lay as a sort of oasis amid the dry meadows and where my walk ended.
On this day the first of July—all Nature was still in the freshness of early summer and not yet blighted by the heat. A happy between seasons when many of the spring flowers were still blooming and already some of the summer ones were to be seen.
As I came through the valley I could find in odd corners violets both the anemone, the pink cranesbill and herb Robert, the mitrewort and the lossestrife. And of the birds, the song sparrow, the chipping sparrow, the veery, the redstart, and the red wing were singing. Everywhere was invitingly cool and shady.
But the real glory of the day was on the field. Those big open stretches, still dewy and in the freshness of early morning, were alone worth the whole ramble. Wild flowers were everywhere. Buttercups and odd-eyes, Canada thistles and the fence row ragwort, butter-and-eggs, star thistles, yarrow and blue chrys, and little patches of mayweed and everlasting grew modestly here and there.
Over this dew the bobolink bubbled out his wild music. The savanna and the vesper sparrow sang and the meadowlark whistled, and perhaps, occasionally, I heard the distant rattle of the upland plover.
And when I finally came to the little pond I was sure to find it luxuriant in its quiet picturesque beauty of many kinds: its white calla lilies, yellow pond lilies, and pink persicaria. I would be sure to hear the red wings and swamp sparrows sing, and there was the odd chance that the bittern would fly up.
All this was years ago. The overgrowing city has engulged much of this beauty. The little valley has largely disappeared. Its clear flowing stream has become the merest trickle. The beautiful fields are now cut up into suburban streets flanked with houses. The trail of my "Botany day" walk can no longer be followed, for much has been permanently effected. Yet the memory of those glorious hours spent on Dominion Day of years ago will never fade. Years of rambling since, not without study, have brought to me much more intimate knowledge of both the flowers and the birds which I saw on those walks, but I doubt if even with this more intimate knowledge in my later years ever equalled the pure unalloyed joy and genuine care-free pleasure I had in those bygone years when things were, for the most part, new to me and I could ramble and simply enjoy them all.

FROM SCRAP FILE TO BOMB RACK
Tons of scrap metal now being salvaged from Canadian back yards are being quickly converted into bombs in one of the world's largest bomb plants in the Province of Quebec. In upper left a load of scrap is being picked up by a magnetic crane carried to the furnaces of the bomb plant. In upper right a charming plant worker is shown beside the completed bomb and in the lower photo another worker gleefully marks a special destination on one of the 500-pound missiles. According to officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the normal output of this plant will be over one hundred thousand bombs a year.

These three happy faces display a personal reaction to the news of set-backs for Nazi forces in Russia and smashing R.A.F. attacks on Germany's vital war centres. Intended victims of Hitler's U-boat campaign, the three British women learned of Nazi reverses when they arrived in New York after their rescue from a torpedoed vessel in the north Atlantic. They'll derive more satisfaction from Prime Minister Churchill's promise that the relentless pounding of German invasion ports and industrial cities is becoming even more devastating than the Luftwaffe's raids on Britain.
