After Ten Years

BY MARION RUBINCAN

Chapter 12

It seemed to Patsy, sitting there on the floor listening to her sister's complaints, that the whole situation was hopeless. She tried to ask questions, yet, if she had to help Millie to find a solution, she certainly had to understand the problem better than she did. She really hated being made a confidant. Marriage in her mind was something sacred, something that concerned two people only. No other should be told either their joys, or its unfortunate failures. She said finally:

"I think you've narrowed your life too much. You haven't enough interests outside Humphrey. You look him all the time, and never notice any of the women who play cards."

Millie, restlessly moving her shoulders, a trick she had when nervous, answered:

"What do you expect? All the men in our set are married; if I want what the Reverend Millie is missing in her now, but it's always some good purpose. And there's the club."

"The bridge club?" Patsy asked, her eyes showing amusement as she remembered the system of fines and rewards where hours of work took the place of money. This reminded her of many times when she had been in the club, and she had been the one to knit the sweater and the hat for the children's sweat suits because they went faster, and being short of money the day she bought the yarn she purchased a cheap grade containing cotton.

"No, there's that, and the then-tennis club. I was made vice president this year. It rather than that president it's a much more honor and no work. Mrs. Worsley is president but she likes running things."

Millie rattled on quite fast, but Patsy looked after the poor in the town and was a member of the Civic Improvement Committee, at least she was going to have one, and as everything was in readiness every subject to keep ourselves up to date. We take up courses of instruction and I'm not narrow minded, I look at all the books I've got. Patsy looked at her sister and was across the subject of this or the other's short comings. She wanted to borrow some books, anyway.

Millie's library was gorgeous. Uniform sets of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray and Shakespeare represented English literature. American was represented by a well-chosen set of Fennimore Coopers, and of Hawthorne. The delectable monkey of these "sets" was slightly relieved by some volumes of the undulating field stretching up to the water's edge, the green patches intermingled with autumn as much like a cushion as possible. French literature, being considered immoral, was not included at all.

Patsy had read everything here when she was a child. She took to cheer them on there was not wish them bon voyage. The cheering of the handkerchiefs and the shouting on shore grew dim in the distance, the real work of the voyage had started. The engine mate peeps the deck glasses in the hand on the look out for any night little craft to greet. The chug chug of the engine as she pushes the water aside, the noise in their ears. some of the volumes down, running through their clean, stiff pages. In most the pages were uncut, they had not yet been touched.

She got up from the floor, locking the books again behind their glass doors. Millie, viewing them with great satisfaction, said: "I think they look real neat. A lot of old books sitting on open shelves, so messy. Besides, they're constant dusting. Where are you going?"

"To the library," Patsy answered. "Come along, the walk will be good for you."

As Millie went to get her coat and hat, the young girl stood staring at the book case with all its crowded oak trimmings. She looked completely discouraged. Then a whimsical smile brightened her face.

When Millie came in, she said: "You know, my dear, you're exactly like your library of books. You haven't permitted yourself a book or a feeling that isn't entirely standardized, and approved of by everybody. You think of the way the bindings look on the outside, and the way your thoughts look to others before you utter them. You've not read a new book, nor had a new emotion, for years."

"What do you mean, you're talking?" Millie interrupted. "But Patsy, walking along to the library, dropped the subject and began about the visit of Mrs. Gainer-Munn. She had had a wife that morning, saying this lady was coming within a week for a visit."

Monday—Great Expectations

THE MAIDEN TRIP OF THE LADY BYNG

The Lady Byng is a staunch little craft, built by James Mullins here during the past year. She has sailed a few weeks ago, and during the last few days were spent in installing the engine and putting on the finishing touches, making her ready for sea. Quite a number of the residents of the peaceful community of Tryon gathered along the shore dressed in holiday attire when it became known that she was about to start on her maiden voyage. Presently men being short of money the day she bought the yarn she purchased a cheap grade containing cotton.

Mr. J. C. Holland, R. A. Howard, Earl Boulter, J. H. Howland, Mr. J. B. McEldgen and others. Mr. Thomas Carr, was in command. Mr. J. C. Howard who is a descendant of the men who took the first voyage around the horizon in the sea was second mate. Mr. Arthur Howatt, Chief Engineer. On Wednesday, November the ninth, at two-thirty p. m. the captain and his officers after bidding their own and was a member of the Civic Improvement Committee, at least she was going to have one, and as everything was in readiness every subject to keep ourselves up to date. We take up courses of instruction and I'm not narrow minded, I look at all the books I've got. Patsy looked at her sister and was across the subject of this or the other's short comings. She wanted to borrow some books, anyway.

Except for a few belated laborer returning with their fisherman nets, there was nothing to disturb the peaceful scene on the beautiful bay of water. The Pilot Jack, a boat fluted lazily from the main head, slightly relieved by some volumes of the undulating field stretching up to the water's edge, the green patches intermingled with autumn as much like a cushion as possible. French literature, being considered immoral, was not included at all.
